counter that by advertising, "Table Seating for Ladies."

HERSBERGER, A graying, bearded 34-year-old, travels across the country researching roadside design and collecting postcards, maps and signs. He has everything from a huge 1935 Texaco sign to a Shell station trademark shell that an Iowa family thought was a birdbath.

Many of the signs are made of porcelain-enamelled steel, which involves placing ground, colored glass on pieces of steel and then firing it to make a design. The result is a durable finish that holds up for years.

Not many of these remnants of

"Much of what we do, where we eat lunch, where we get our car serviced, the whole development of suburban area, would not exist without the automobile."

— Dan Hershberger, associate professor.

the past remain. Hed Knapp's Dairy Bar on Main Street in Rochester, originally had a Vitrolite exterior, which involves gluing painted panes of glass onto the building. By the early '70s, the glass was cracking and Knapp bricked over the exterior.

But a few years ago, Butch Knapp, current owner of the restaurant, went to great expense to restore the Vitrolite exterior. The interior is still that of an early '50s milk shop, complete with a double-U-shaped counter.

Italy's Drive-In in Plymouth has a neon sign from the '50s. Hershberger says its spectacular and an orange "mountain range" style canopy over the cars. The Dairy Drive-In in Wayne has an undulating orange and blue, "rock and roll" canopy made out of metal.

THE PROBLEM is that many of these signs and buildings aren't quite old enough to be appreciated. But Hershberger points out that the pace of change today makes things that happened even 20 or 30 years ago quite different than now.

"I like to talk about the idea of 'recent history,'" he adds. "When we talk about the '70s, that's only 20 years ago. But look how much has happened in 20 years."

Hershberger will take a large garish roadsign over a tasteful imitation-van one day.

"People today want everything to be homogeneous and blend in with the landscape," he said. "But these things have an identity, an exuberance about them. More important, they're part of our history."

Roadside enthusiast Dan Hershberger calls this early '60s neon sign at Daly's Drive-In in Plymouth spectacular. The restaurant also has an orange "mountain range" canopy made of metal.
