'Cold Turkey' Is Zany Fare

By BETTY MASSON

The movie "Cold Turkey" is rather cold, but it's no turkey.

Instead it is a very funny film which satirizes practically everything and everybody possible, the ministry, the medical profession, the Army, John Birchers, small towns and big cities.

It has a zany and a view of humanity which reminds me of "Alice's Restaurant." Maybe it's because the most interesting characters are citizens of Eagle Rock, Iowa, playing themselves.

The camera is used to paint portraits of the people with an unflattering, but human, eye.

Rating: GP

A UNITED ARTISTS production, "Cold Turkey" hangs its satire on the supposition that a tobacco mogul is willing to pay any town in the U. S. $25 million to quit smoking.

Dick Van Dyke, in the role of a handsome young preacher, persuades the dying town of Eagle Rock to take up the challenge.

He's spurred on by his own selfish motives...he wants to do something spectacular in order to get moved to a church in Dearborn, Mich.

"GM country, you know" according to the film.

PIPPA SCOTT is great (comparable to Van Dyke's TV wife Mary Tyler Moore) as his movie wife. She is a secret smoker, who is constantly told by her husband not to slouch. She's also one of the few people who sees through Van Dyke's machinations.

Barnard Hughes plays the town doctor, a chain smoker who has and gives the most trouble. Jean Stapleton plays the little old lady who enthusiastically tries to prevent people from smoking, with a gun if necessary.

But her language could stand a filter. It's not a movie for the kiddies on a Saturday afternoon.

Norman Lear, the director and producer, also wrote the screenplay, and it's fun up to the ending, which is a bit of a fizzle.
