• COMPARING PRESCRIPTIONS - TAKING ADVICE

You may have experienced the following: a friend of yours used a drug prescribed by your doctor, and your friend if feeling fine. At your next appointment with your doctor, you intend to ask him if you could take the drug. Considering a new medication based on what you heard from others is dangerous in arthritis. First, it is likely that your arthritis is not the same as the one treated successfully by the other drug. There are more than a hundred arthritic conditions. Each one differs from the others by its cause, treatment, and outcome. Medications are not the same for all conditions.

Second, the report of success may be wrong. If you are hearing second hand about an improvement, you should be careful before believing what you are told. Often a new drug has an early success but in a few months the person is back into the same condition as before.

Third, recall that all medicines have side effects. A new medication may seem wonderful but continued use often brings out its toxic side.

If a medication fails to decrease your pain or improve your mobility, then a change is in order. Let your doctor's knowledge of appropriate drugs form the basis for that move.
