Farmington eyes crackdown on skateboarding

Sidewalk skateboarders beware.

Farmington city officials will look at other cities' laws to decide whether to put more teeth into local enforcement, after an apparent increase in skateboarding problems encountered by residents.

"They're difficult to handle — and they are increasing," said Farmington public safety director Frank Lauhoff. "If it doesn't get any worse, it's not such a big issue. But I assume it will increase."

Since only bicycles are addressed in the traffic code, the only thing police can do with skateboard or roller skating problems now is issue a trespassing ticket, Lauhoff said.

The issue was brought to the city's attention by resident Debbie Cornwell, president of the Longacre Elementary PTA, who said she and other parents have noticed a problem with older students using the school's curbing and front porch as a jump. She also noted similar problems in local strip malls, and was surprised there was no law in place to address the problem.

City officials said they are willing to look into changing the law, but said on property such as school grounds and private parking lots, they must have permission to come onto the grounds and enforce the law.

In the case of the schools, a resolution of the Farmington school board would be required before the city could change the law, city attorney John Donohue said.

City manager Robert Deadman said an "extensive education" process and adequate signing throughout the community would have to occur with any change in the law.

Councilwoman Joanne McShane said she is interested in reviewing laws passed in other cities. "I know I've almost hit one of these people in a parking lot, and almost been hit by one when walking."

Deadman said he would bring a draft of a "model ordinance" for council consideration at a future meeting, and would also contact the school district to see what action officials there might want to take.
