

Relax and enjoy experience with local cable

Talent on a television show can be defined as the description of the hosts, guests or entertainment throughout the program. The television audience depends on such a person to guide them along throughout the program. Therefore, the tone and momentum many times is determined by the energy and confidence which exudes from them.

To help create this professional demeanor, there are a few tips to remember:

Talent should relax and enjoy their experience in the studio. Community Access programming content most times depends on the expertise of the individual.

With discussions on topics of one's life, business or hobby, most should feel at ease that they already know the information. The talent, therefore, may concentrate on the other persons on the show.

Talent should be sure to have a conversation with the director or producer before the show begins to ensure that they understand any special instructions.

Once the program begins taping, directions will be given by the in-studio floor director. Talent should ignore all other activity in the studio or control room even if they think they have missed up.

The only time the show is to be

cable connection
Lark Samouelian
 executive director,
 Southwestern Oakland Cable Commission

interrupted is when the floor director gives the sign to "cut."

This means that there have been technical difficulties. There are simple hand and arm signals which talent may become familiar with.

Also, talent does not have to look for a camera in a multicamera shoot, as the cameras will follow the action. An open or closing remark or a predetermined point in the audience would have been preplanned and a specific camera selected for the talent to look toward.

The talent is important to the crew, who are also working as a team to accomplish a fine production. The energy of the talent and interest level of the program will encourage the crew to also enjoy their responsibilities.

I would like all to remember that a smile is a gift to those who look at you. It opens the windows to our hearts and encourages everyone to feel hope and vitality.
