The largest manager of one of the employment New York utilities was confronted one morning recently by a young man seeking a job in the index or collection department. After a short talk the manager discovered that the applicant had arrived in New York from Ireland only a few months ago, and he requested recommendations.

Promptly the young man withdrew four letters from his inner pocket and submitted them. Each was worded about the same, stating that the bearer had been employed by the writer for a certain period and left when he was taken to prison. A different prison was mentioned in each letter.

"Say, young man," said the employment manager suddenly, "you must be proud of the fact that you have been in every jail in Ireland."

"Yes, sir," replied the applicant. "I have been in nine prisons in my time, but I was sent to this because of my activities toward the establishment of an Irish republic. When we got the Free State government I became a legal subject, and when I left I held the position of lieutenant in the Free State constabulary."—Wall Street Journal.
