

WEST FARMINGTON

The East Walled Lake Home Management meeting met at the home of Mrs. Arthur Green Friday with a number of the class absent on account of sickness. They had a very interesting meeting, the subjects were "Dining Room, Its Care and Surroundings" and "The Living Room and Its Furnishings." They took their first lesson on music appreciation. The class was very glad to have Miss McDonald of Pontiac meet with them.

Mr. and Mrs. William Kurtz and daughter Dorothea and Mr. and Mrs. Harvey Robison, motored to Plymouth Tuesday evening for a six o'clock dinner given at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Reinas in honor of their son's birthday anniversary.

HER PREFERENCE

"Gert, do you care for Carmen?" "Well, yes, but I believe I like fremen better."

New Insulating Material

A new type of insulating material recently developed in the research laboratory of the General Electric company, which is being used in the manufacture of radio high-frequency insulators, not only solves the problem of an improved insulator for such high frequencies as are encountered in radio work, but also solves a problem in more efficient utilization of materials. The new insulation, known as mycalex, is a composition of ground mica and lead borate.

Had Left His Heart Behind Him

By JEAN TARPIN

SHE saw him coming across the street. She had dreamed that he would come to her after all the parting and pain, when she had jilted him to marry his best friend. Her husband had died, and Jim Duere had written her of courtship and of confidence from his new home in Hawaii. She had not seen him since her wedding day until now, when she had been widowed two years; he came across the Florida sands.

"I have waited for you to come," she said with a smile. "The years have been filled with work," he said briefly. How fine he was. He seemed to retain all of his old youthful vigor, his clear, alert eyes, his humorous mouth that once had been grimly unsmiling.

"You have never married." She made the statement as one accepts a fact. "Why not?" he said soberly. Her head drooped and her white fingers played with the pebbles. "Life is cruel, Dick. We expect so much of life at twenty!"

"We do that at twenty and at every succeeding birthday. Even now, at forty, I expect much of life." "Poor boy," she wanted to say, "I will give it to you now." But she was too clever to force his hand. She believed that he had checked her picture in his faithful heart all these years—and she was right. He had crossed the continent to come to her and win her love, if possible. She would take her back to his beautiful island home and they would make up for the bitter years.

"You deserve your heart's desire," she said softly. He winced. "I wonder just how you define one's heart's desire." She hesitated. Of course she had heard of his extensive plantations in that Pacific paradise—he was becoming rich. But all she still loved was him. A great wave was coming in to break in ice-like foam on the sands. A dainty pink shell fell at his feet. He held it to his ear.

"I tell the beach at home in Hawaii," he said dreamily. "Dick—Hawaii is thousands of miles away—and your shell smells too strongly of the sea—I hate it!"

"I're that salt savor of the sea—and the musical clash of shells on a tropical shore—I cannot picture you there, Janet."

"What is it like—there?" she asked. "Ride out with me in the early morning mist. My house is on a hillside, in a garden filled with rose, heliotrope, orange trees, overrun with yellow jasmine, and blazing with scarlet hibiscus. The birds are brilliant jewels, the wind is sweet with dipping fruits and myriads of flowers. A brisk ride across the pineapple plantation, down the slope, and then, the beach and the sea."

"Poor boy—so alone," she murmured. He began to be irritated by her tone. He had believed he was rather to be envied out there in his own place—and if Janet thought he missed the round of society to which she was devoted, she was mistaken. Out in that island paradise there was a woman—a mere slip of a girl—a wholesome, fun-loving bit of femininity, the sister of one of his partners. There were golden freckles on her adorable nose—her eyes were dark blue and not too sophisticated. The very thought of this girl made him homesick, though he had never had a sentimental thought of her before—he had never dreamed of marrying her. He had always thought he would marry Janet or remain a bachelor.

He tossed the shell toward an incoming wave. "What are you doing?" she idly asked. "Giving it a last chance to go back to Hawaii," he said whimsically. "You foolish boy—as if it could go through the Isthmus of Panama. Ah, your shell has gone!"

"The undertow has caught it and carried it out to sea—home, some day, let us hope." He stood there looking down at her faded loveliness. "The wave of homesickness has caught me, too, Janet, and I am going back. Some day, perhaps, you will come to my island—I will gather my friends and we will be very gay and fashionable for awhile."

"And your wife—if you have one then—she will be very gay and fashionable, too?" He blushed as ingenuously as a boy. "She is—that is—some day, she may become so—wish me luck, Janet!" "I wish you all the luck in the world, Dick, but I shall not come. I do not like yellow jasmine, and scarlet hibiscus spoils the landscape for me. I will send you a wedding gift some day." He hurried away as if now he could no longer wait. He had come all this distance to find that his heart was behind him in the keeping of that girl at home.

Disappointed

A little girl went away with her mother for a week's visit in the country. When they returned she looked up and down the streets, and at all the houses and said, "Why, the town ain't red is it?" "Of course not, Fannie. Why do you ask that question?" "Just before we started away I heard papa tell Mr. Tompkins that he was going to paint the town red while you were in the country. I guess he must have been busy and didn't have time to do it."—Williamsport Grit.
