Colored glass windows on the north side of a building must differ from those on the south side, else they would not appear alike when viewed from the interior. Placed side by side, the north and south windows would not look at all alike. The south light is much more brillier and seathering than the north and The south light is much more brilliant and penetrating than the north and calls for treatment that will subdue the effect, says a stained glass designer in an interview in the New York Evening Post. For a time churches were practically the only structures using stained glass, but this has changed. Homes, college buildings, libraries, clubs, offices and banks in the larger cities have adopted it. In some instances it is used merely to shut out an unpleasant view. pleasant view.
