Bets and Short Hair
 By JANE OSBORN
 (Copyright.)

"BESIDES, if you had your hair bobbed, you wouldn't look so prim and the boys would like you a lot better," said Mrs. Westerman.
 Mrs. Westerman's niece, Nancy Gray, across the hotel luncheon table, pouted her lips prettily. "You know dad likes my hair long. After you've gone to all the trouble and expense to bring me to the city I hate to be contrary."
 "I knew you'd consent," beamed her aunt. "You'll just have time for it this afternoon. We leave for home at eight tomorrow morning—so you'll have to have it done this afternoon. I'll go right after luncheon to make an appointment."
 Like a good many recently bobbed middle-aged women, Mrs. Westerman was bent on having every other woman—especially the younger ones—follow suit. But that was not all. Before she left Denniston for a week's sojourn in the city with her pretty niece, she had had a substantial wager with her husband that she'd bring Nancy back with short hair, and Mrs. Westerman didn't intend to lose her bet.
 Nancy, always a little afraid of her dominating aunt, hardly dared, but, though she appeared to yield, she had no intention of parting with her lovely golden brown curls. She looked around the hotel dining room as if she had expected someone to appear to champion her. If she only knew someone in the city who might make some other plans for the afternoon. After that it would be too late. It was then that she recognized at a table not far from her own young Brutus Smith—a decidedly presentable young eligible whom she had met a number of times in Denniston. She wasn't at all sure that he would remember her—or that he could rescue her from her aunt and the barber, but Nancy was desperate. Fortunately Brutus was alone. Nancy looked over to him and smiled invitingly. Brutus smiled back, rose from his table and hurried to her side. Nancy introduced him to her aunt. She told Brutus that she thought possibly he had forgotten her.
 "No, indeed," said Brutus. "If you've been bobbed like the rest, I probably shouldn't have remembered right away—not expecting to see you here—but a long-haired girl nowadays is like a blue-eyed Chinaman."
 "There, didn't I tell you," eagerly put in Mrs. Westerman. "You see I've been telling Nancy that she was making a spectacle of herself with her hair still long. But suppose you get the waiter to bring your things over here with Nancy. I've got to go out to do some telephoning." She beamed approvingly at Nancy and bustled off.
 "I suppose you are busy this afternoon," began Nancy, blushing.
 Brutus came to her rescue. "I had several tentative plans," he said. "But it just occurred to me that if you'd care to go to a play with me I'd be tickled to death."
 "But I didn't mean to suggest it," said Nancy, much confused. "My aunt was trying to get me to do something I didn't want to do this afternoon, and if I could tell her that I had accepted an invitation from you—why, you could just leave me at a public library or a museum or somewhere."
 "Well, chance a girl like you would have of spending an afternoon alone in a museum or a library—while I'm able to loiter. We'll get your aunt's permission and go right on. But don't flatter yourself that you started this." Brutus went on as they saw Mrs. Westerman approaching. "I was just about to make some such suggestion myself. Moreover I was going to ask you to go to a little dance with me this evening. Nice refined little clobber of mine. Your aunt couldn't object— plenty of chairs will be there."
 Mrs. Westerman really didn't have an opportunity to object, so insistent were both Nancy and Brutus.
 "But, dear," said her aunt, "I've just made an appointment for you. Oh, well, I'll go ask them to take you at five."
 "I'm so sorry," beamed the bold young Nancy, "but Mr. Smith was just saying that he wanted to take me to afternoon tea after the matinee."
 The next morning Brutus met Mrs. Westerman and her niece at the hotel at breakfast. He brought with him orchids and chocolates. At the station he kissed Nancy goodby. "You won't object," he told Mrs. Westerman, "because I'm in love with your niece. I'm coming out to Denniston day after tomorrow to talk things over."
 Brutus Smith kept his word. He came two days later, proposed to Nancy and was accepted. Later Mrs. Westerman had a minute to speak to Brutus alone. "I am perfectly delighted," she said, "even if it did cost me fifty dollars. You see I bet my husband that I'd bring Nancy home with her hair bobbed."
 Brutus laughed. "Funny thing is—the reason I made such a quick bid for Nancy, the minute I saw her, there at the hotel, was because I'd made a wager with one of the fellows at the club that I'd bring a pretty girl to the dance that had long hair. They said there weren't any like that any more. And of course I won the bet—blew the whole thing in on orchids and candy the next morning. But I'm going to stand your loss, you see if I don't."
