Frankincense is a variety of gum that frequently forms a component of incense, but the term is not met, with in commerce, to which incense means a gum that exudes from a tree flourishing in considerable quantities in British Somaliand and elsewhere. There is an inferior gum of this kind that grows in India and other countries of the East. The incense tree seldom attains a height exceeding 15 feet. It presents a thorny and unsightly growth and thrives in desert regions. Dealers grade incense according to color—bright yellow, medium and dark yellow. The chief market for it seems to be Aden, whence it is taken by Somalis during the winter Frankincense is a variety of gun
