Sent on a Fool's Errand

"SHE was spotted in the making," said her sisters, cousins and aunts—and others. That seemed to be the consensus of opinion in regard to Corinne Snow.
From the time she was a little girl had she insisted upon having her own way, and as her mother found it easier to follow the line of least resistance, she indulged her up to a wilful and disobedient child and very often a disagreeable one.
As she approached womanhood, she vented her moods upon the young men of her acquaintance. But because when she was good, she was very good, and when she was bad, she was horrid, and so very charming when she chose to be, they put up with her tantrums—all but one young man who had just moved into the town and whom Corinne had but recently met.
As usual, she proceeded to charm and then to manage him, but the latter didn't come to pass. It plucked her vanity not a little, and when one day at two o'clock, he made it plain that what she had in mind couldn't be done, she felt greatly chagrined.
Corinne did not take kindly to disappointments, and when anyone interfered with her plans, vindictiveness came strongly to the fore.
March was drawing to a close and April was hard by. Still smarting under the last rebuke that Saunders had given her, she decided that the coming holiday was an opportune time to square matters with him.
For two weeks it had rained almost incessantly and at times the water literally came down in buckets. The effect of such a gloomy rain upon unaccustomed country roads may well be imagined.
On the morning of that day, Saunders heard a voice tell him over the telephone at his office that his dog had run away and that he could be found at Mrs. Webb's cottage on Salem street, a small white cottage at the end of the road. The voice added that Mrs. Webb was very deaf and not entirely responsible mentally, so that she might possibly deny having the dog.
Saunders thanked the person and said he would call for the dog that afternoon.
Corinne chafed as she hung up the receiver. She could see him parking his car at the house and trading the full length of Salem street, as it was utterly impossible for anything on wheels to pull through the mire. Of course, Saunders did not know that old Mrs. Webb's sense of hearing was as keen as his and that shouting at her would greatly irritate her none too amiable disposition. Arguing with her was sheer lunacy, too. It promised to be an unpleasant session for him and Saunders would by no means emerge victorious.
Meanwhile he would be greatly worried by the supposed disappearance of his prize stud.
She thought the joke was such a good one that she told several of her friends about it. In time it reached his ears, but he gave no sign of his acquaintance with the fact.
Several weeks passed and Corinne decided that at her dinner party she would let him know who had sent him on his fool's errand. Then they would all make merry at his expense and Corinne knew he hated to be laughed at. That would teach him a lesson. He would then understand that she was the kind of young lady whose slightest whim should be regarded as important.
"It is riding over him a bit rough-shod," she soliloquized, "but any happening on a holiday should be accepted good naturedly."
The truth of the matter was that she liked him best of all the young men of her acquaintance, but first scores had to be made even, then she would be kindly.
Accordingly she asked him to call, which he did. When he was about to leave, she said: "By the way, I am giving a dinner party on the evening of April 15 and I would very much like you to come."
"Thank you, Miss Snow," he said. "Nothing would give me greater pleasure, but a previous engagement prevents my being here. You see, a very strange thing happened to me a few days ago."
Corinne felt the color leave her face. "Someone wishing to play a trick on me, told me on the telephone that my dog had run off. When I called at the house where I was directed, a nurse sent me at the door. She had been sent for to take care of Mrs. Webb, who was ill."
"The nurse happened to be a schoolmate of mine of whom I had lost track. It was a happy coincidence, and I am truly grateful to the one who sent me on such a delightful fool's errand!"
