EPA PROJECT MANAGER

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (NVFEL in Ann Arbor, Michigan is looking for an engineer with experience and high potential to lead and manage EPA's growing programs designed to investigate ways to reduce emissions from motor vehicles. You will be challenged by the opportunities provided to work with your knowledge of heat engines and emission control technology. Practical and theoretical expertise in engine design and development for spark ignition and compression ignition engines is highly desirable. The role of alternative fuels will be a key route toward achieving future air quality benefits in our most polluted cities. You will be the key technical program manager for EPA's efforts to develop clean engines that utilize alternative fuels and effective emission control systems for them. In order to quantify the benefits of alternative fuels such as methanol, ethanol, natural gas, LPG and reformulated gasoline, you will be expected to have expertise in the use of both alternative and conventional fuels. You will be able to explore new ideas for fuel utilization and emission control from the concept phase to which you will be expected to contribute substantially through the engine and vehicle dynamometer test phases to small-scale fleet testing. Your management and presentation skills will be utilized as you manage a variety of projects targeted toward enhancing the benefits of alternative fuels and overcoming any drawbacks associated with them. Salary range of $54,607 to $70,987 pa. For qualification requirements and application materials call
