mation sheets for each chemical, appropriately labeling materials and disposing of necessary materials.

Staff members were trained in chemical handling procedures in 1988 and 1989, he said, admitting that the training probably needed updating. "We've done a lot of things — we haven't plugged all the holes, obviously," Baumunk said.

Cowan said he believed the district had paid close attention to high school labs and rooms, and now must "pull in the reins a bit and check things at the middle schools."

School board secretary Joseph Svake, who heads the board's safety committee, suggested building principals address the chemical issue during building orientation in the fall, then recheck their chemical inventory and storage at the end of the year.

Farmington Hills Deputy Fire Chief Peter Baldwin said his department is ready to offer whatever assistance is necessary to the district in their study. "Our job here is to help the schools be safe places," he said. "I think they're doing the right thing in reviewing the issue."
