ARTHRITIS &amp; PAIN

The therapies physicians use to treat arthritis do not always suffice. Despite medicine, rest, heat and joint injection, you may remain in pain.

In fact, the worse feature of your arthritis can be the pain. It can bring on tension, steal your sleep, sabotage your work, and make enjoyment impossible.

When you face such pressures and lack adequate pain relief, you may feel that the medical community is unaware of or indifferent to the suffering caused by your arthritis.

Such is not the case. The problem doctors face in treatment stems from their knowledge that the pain can come daily and do so for years. Given the condition, use of strong pain killers such as narcotics is predictable. If you are young, use of narcotics brings possible addiction. If you are elderly you have no such concern. However, taking even low dose codeine brings on the possibility of drug related loss of coordination and equilibrium; you are at substantial risk for a fall. In turn, injury can bring on a broken hip, leg or skull. Any of these complications cause expense and distress far beyond the pain you presently feel.

In treating arthritis, physicians must rely on said pain relievers in addition to heat, rest, medication and time. These measures, while not always adequate, are safe both for you and society.
