tion they offer. School districts will have an incentive to enroll as many students as possible, he said, because more money would come from the state with each student.

The Minnesota school system is like that, Engler said, and "makes a hell of a lot of sense." Berman said the Minnesota system is falling.

Engler also believes that some Michigan school districts would be better off to merge with adjacent districts. "We could try to marry them off to each other," he said, "force them to merge."

Power & authority

Engler likewise hopes to give greater autonomy to school districts. "My attitude is going to be to keep the mandate to an absolute minimum," he said. "(School boards) end up with the all-important role, more power and authority than they have today."

Berman contends that Engler is trying to become the state's "education czar" with a firm grip on education policy. "School districts already had autonomy," she said, and Engler has "completely destroyed local control."

Other ideas Engler tossed out included: ■ permitting students who complete graduation requirements in the 11th grade to spend their 12th-grade funding on college.
