Would-Be "Highbrow" as Others See Them

Oliver Burton Canby, the poet of Denver, was criticizing the New York literary clique.
"This little crowd of reviewers, novelists and playwrights," he said, "declare that they lead the world. They believe it, too. It's a joke."
"To cultivated minds they seem exactly like the young couple that met at the (Quoque) Browning society's strawberry festival and talked like this:
"Are you literary?"
"Surest thing you know! Are you?"
"You bet!"
"Read much high-brow stuff?"
"Sure!"
"How about Homer?"
"Oh, I'm stuck on Homer. Shakespeare's all right, too."
"You bet he is! How about Wadsworth and Tennyson?"
"Some writers! I'll tell you who's a good writer, too."
"Who?"
"Goethe."
"Yes, Goethe is good, isn't he?"
Mr. Canby gave a disgusted laugh.
"And that," he ended, "is what the reviews and novels and plays of New York's clique seem like to cultivated minds."
