Vagaries Not to Be Classed as Madness

Maxim Gorky wrote in his diary, "When I watch how a man behaves when he is alone by himself I always come to the conclusion that he is mad." He relates how he saw Chekhov, sitting in his garden, try to catch a sunbeam in his hat and place both on his head and become irritable when he failed; how he watched an English clown, thinking himself unobserved in the deserted passage of a circus, take off his top hat and bow respectfully to his own reflection; how he overheard Tolstoy say to himself, in a low whisper, "Are you happy?" and, after peering cautiously around, confide to the lizard, "As to me—I am not"; and once he observed a priest stand his boot in front of himself and say, "Well, wait!" and, after an interval, add with dignity, "You see!" But it is taking time too seriously to find madness in these and other such vagaries.—Montreal Family Herald.

Using Library Wisely

It is one thing to own a library; it is quite another to use it wisely. I have often been astonished how little care people devote to selection of what they read. Books, we know, are almost innumerable; our hours for reading are, alas, very few. And yet many people read almost by hazard. They will take any book they chance to find in a room at a friend's house; they will buy a novel at a railway stall if it has an attractive title. Indeed, I believe in some cases even the binding affects their choice. The selection is, no doubt, far from easy.—Sir John Lubbock.

New Haven Sinner

In 1947 William Blagden, a resident of New Haven, had the misfortune to fall into the hands of one Saturday night. He could light no fire on Sunday, according to his interpretation of the blue laws, so while his suit and undergarments were drying in the air, William lay in bed to keep warm and did not go to church. They kept close watch in those days on delinquent worshippers, so this offender was called upon to explain. In spite of what would seem a very good excuse, Blagden was adjudged guilty of "slothfulness" sentenced to be "publicly whipped."

Our Past

Our past is our secret, promulgated by the voice of years; it is the most mysterious image of our being, over which time keeps watch. The image is not dead; a mere nothing depends or adorns it; it can still grow bright or somber, can still sully or weep, express love or hatred; and yet it remains recognizable forever in the midst of the myriad changes that surround it. It stands for what we once were, as our aspirations and hopes stand for what we shall be; and the two faces blend, that they may teach us what we are.—Maeterlinck.

Envy or No?

Billy's father often had trouble in getting Billy to eat the food that was best for him. One of these foods was oatmeal, which Billy detested. One morning for breakfast the food was served, much to Billy's displeasure. Billy's father, on seeing that the oatmeal had not been touched, said, "Son, you ought to be ashamed of yourself. Many boys and girls would be happy to get as little as half of that oatmeal."

"Mr. too," replied Billy.
