FOR DIGESTIVE SYSTEM PROTECTION

Non-steroid anti-inflammatory drugs (NSAIDS) are a group of drugs which are widely prescribed in the treatment of arthritis and other conditions. They are generally safe but in high risk patients including the elderly they may be associated with a variety of side effects mainly in the digestive system. Such as indigestion, erosions on the surface of the stomach and duodenum, ulcers, and ulcer complications such as bleeding and perforation. Esophageal and small intestinal ulcers and strictures might also occur. Injury to and bleeding from the colon, and activation of colitis have been reported as well to a lesser degree.

To protect against such damage it is best to avoid the NSAID's whenever possible. In case you still need to take it, lowering the dose might help or ulcer type medication and/or other agent to protect the mucosal surface or digestive system can be given simultaneously.
