Red-Orange-Yellow Family

These filters are the most important when shooting in black and white. Beginning with yellow and ending with red, this family of filters progressively darkens the blue of the sky to add all-important impact to your pictures. With no filter, separation between blue sky and clouds will be lost in a black and white print and the sky will appear washed out. But by using one of this family of filters, here's what happens. A yellow filter darkens the sky to a light gray. The orange filter darkens it further and the red makes the sky almost black. The clouds always remain white.

So can your visualize the drama three filters will add to your shot? The way they work is that yellow orange-red filters progressively block the blue light from the sky from reaching the filt during exposure—yellow the least, red the most. The resulting prints therefore show progressive darkness in the sky.

Degree of separation: Monte Nagler used a red filter to dramatically darken the blue sky in this picture of a lone tree in Window Rock, Ariz. Note the separation between the sky and the clouds produced by the filter.

Common Filters with Color Filters are an inexpensive instance of the filters I recently discussed in my column on color filters are also very useful when shooting in black and white. The skylight serves as protection or "insurance" for an expensive lens. The diffusion filter softens harsh facial lines in a black.

Picture Lady seeks helping hands, hearts:

The Artists' Gallery in Farmington Hills was the site of a special display Wednesday.

It was a Gala Evening of Art Enrichment at the gallery, 2009 Orchard Lake Road, for Picture Lady Program volunteers. They celebrated Michigan Glass Month with artist Annette Berenholz, who gave a demonstration about her jewelry creation.

Picture Lady volunteers (there

her jewelty creation.

Picture Lady volunteers (there are Picture Grandpas and other male workers, too) are gems of another type. They present art in the classroom to students in kindergarten to fifth grade. They focus on a variety of subjects, such as the artist's techniques or the mood or historical significance of the works. Prints or reproductions are left in the classroom for a month.

The art enrichment program expands beyond the immediate beyond two times a year. The immediate population and the local committee — Selects the continuous populations, seasions, metal to four times a year. The interior population and the local
