Kids On Block to promote awareness of handicaps

Farmington Summer Fun Series attendees will have the opportunity to welcome an international program to the Civic Theatre on Wednesday, June 22.

"Kids On The Block," a program promoting handicap awareness through use of oversized puppets, will debut as an integral part of the series because of efforts by the Farmington DDA and the merchants of the historic Cook Building.

The Summer Fun Series is on Wednesdays throughout most of the summer to provide area families with free, enriching programs and, at the same time, encourage residents to view their downtown district as a viable shopping and entertainment resource.

"Including this program in our series is a highlight for me. It means we're entertaining kids while still giving them important perspectives that might make a real difference for the future," said DDA director Judy Downey.

The "Kids On The Block" program was developed in 1977 by Barbara Aiello, a teacher who was faced with a surprising challenge. Aiello wanted a cerebral palsy student to return to the mainstream classroom, but found the young man who was physically challenged yet mentally capable, apprehensive because of the isolation he felt by fellow students, teachers and parents.

In exchange for his effort to "tough it out," the teacher promised to do all she could to help educate the other students, teachers and parents on the capabilities of disabled people. From this objective has sprung an international organization of volunteer puppeteers who let kids (and grownups, too) know that we're all different, but alike.

The puppetry style used by "Kids On The Block" is called bun-raku, a Japanese format where the puppeteer is dressed all in black and stands behind the puppet, in full view of the audience.

"This is an especially difficult style to work with during the question period following the performance where it is hard for the puppeteer/retired teacher to stay in character," Diane Wurlock, director of the Royal Oak troupe, said.

Wurlock's troupe will represent the international organization at the Summer Fun Series.

Schedules for all Summer Fun events are available at both branches of the Farmington Library, the Chamber of Commerce or all downtown Farmington retail shops.

Hills endorses Detroit's recovery plan

The Farmington Hills City Council unanimously endorsed the City of Detroit's application for designation as an empowerment zone at the June 13 meeting.

"I have noticed a tremendous surge of support for Mayor Dennis Archer," said councilman Alvin Vagstad. "And his freeing up of $4 million for SMART buses shows that he is not just for Detroit, but for the suburbs."

The empowerment zone and enterprise program is designed in a first step to rebuild communities in poverty-stricken inner cities and rural areas. The federal government will designate up to six urban empowerment zones. The program would create jobs within Detroit and its suburbs and the region.
