VALUE OF IMAGINATION.

Life naturally must be more inter-Life naturally must be more inter-esting to the person of virid imagina-tion than to one who lives only for the tangible, things, about him, and who fears to dream as his fancy wills because, reality bears heavily upon him. We do not think that even the man of affairs would find the indul-gence of a few day dreams detrimental to his interests, while to those who look only upon the serious side of life and share only its, darker aspects, s few dreams of what perhaps may come to pass would act as a tonic upon tired nerves, says the Charleston News and Courier. Our dreams are often com-panions to us, and sometimes we find Courier. Our dreams are often companions to us, and sometimes we find oursilves moving unconsciously with themin a world far removed from our real habitation, but one whose promises seem easy of fulfillment and whose delights compensate for some of the hardships we may, perhaps, be called upon to bear during our waking hours. The world which is our idea of happiness, with all list measure of appreciations—the world in which we naturally play an important part—who has pot seen its shinling sands, and lofty summits, and flowering paths, beckening, telling us how good it is to live and delying us to resist its appealing call? We cannot all gain its aboves and discover long-hidden secrets, but, at least, we can turn its promises to our advantage and make out day dreams cases, as it were, in the desert spots of life.
