'Evita' gives Madonna the role of a lifetime

TICKETS PLEASE

Watching the new movie "Evita," you can't help but draw comparisons to the stage musical on which it's based; to director Alan Parker's similarly frenetic adaptation of "Pink Flamingo"; "The Untouchables"; and to any president with a strong-willed wife who captures the public's eye.

Other comparisons surround its star, Madonna: to her mostly forgettable previous film roles; to her envelope-pushing publicity stunts over the last decade; and to the last woman who could carry a movie musical like this, Barbra Streisand.

By most accounts "Evita" is served well. The comparatively early work (1976) by Andrew Lloyd Webber and Tim Rice still has a certain mechanical quality but much of it makes for pretty outstanding theater, on stage or at the local multiplex (it plays exclusively at the Main Art Theatre before opening wide).

The movie begins appropriately in a movie theater, where the patrons threaten to riot when the projector shuts off. The announcement that Evita Peron, "spiritual leader of Argentina," has died sends the audience into paralysis.

Only one man manages to keep a dry eye. Played with requisite passion by Antonio Banderas, he shows up throughout the film in a number of different guises, an Argentinean everyman who questions what, for all her glitter, Evita really did for the country.

A poor girl with few prospects beyond her good looks, Eva Duarte keeps keeping company with a series of powerful men before ending up with Argentinian politico Juan Peron (Jonathan Pryce), shortly before his ascent to power in the mid-1940s. Identified by the country's lower classes as one of them who made it to the top, she brought glamor to the country while, by most accounts, falling short on her promises for social reform.

In the role of a lifetime, Madonna proves beyond a doubt that she really can act. Of course this is heavy, silent movie drama, with the kind of MTV-style lip-synching that the pop music diva can do in her sleep, but she looks great and virtually carries the film.

Director Parker, who has linked music and movies since "Fame" in 1980, lights Madonna like a modern-day Dietrich. Though his movie takes awhile to start and even longer to wrap up, it still packs a lot of music and energy into just over two hours of film.

Take the "What's New, Buenos Aires?" number, a rousing Latin dance montage where 15-year-old Eva takes the train from her small village into the big city. Hitting the streets ready to make her mark, she registers the same kind of unbridled enthusiasm as Streisand on that tugboat in "Funny Girl."

The "Evita" soundtrack offers the best and worst parts of Webber, from the screechy electric guitars left over from "Jesus Christ Superstar" to lilting ballads like "Another Suitecase in Another Hall." And while I'm not a fan of Webber musicals, Evita's initial performance of "Don't Cry For Me, Argentina" is still stirring.

Like Evita's ascent from tramp to political powerhouse, Madonna hopes to undergo her own transformation as a serious actress. A recent mother with an Oscar nomination potentially looming, the Oakland County native, like her character, appears to have a well-calculated career plan.
