'Volcano' is a blast when L.A. gets blobbed by lava

Who says movies aren't educational? At one point in the $100 million "Volcano," a flaming lava ball shoots from the top of the bubbling inferno and heads for a passerby of bystanders.

"Don't move," warns our hero, a dead-serious seismologist, "until you know where it's going to land."

The relative trajectory of lava balls isn't the only thing I also discovered that, despite their bottomless bag of computer-generated tricks, Hollywood disaster pictures have advanced little since the days of "Earthquake" and "The Towering Inferno."

Of course, well-developed characters and stories aren't what we go to these movies for. Rumbling explosions, deadly lava, general mayhem — this is where "Volcano" really delivers.

The action starts at the La Brea Tar Pits, where volcanic activity had made it one of Los Angeles' major attractions. A moderate earthquake coupled with rising water temperatures in the bubbling pools have at least one scientist (Anne Heche) concerned about the city's future.

Tommy Lee Jones plays the head of Los Angeles Emergency Management. He's understandable skeptical until his morning commute past the tar pits includes exploding manhole covers, a skyful of gray ash and those deadly, unpredictable lava balls.

L.A.-haters, including those who live there, will especially enjoy watching Wilshire Boulevard's glitzy storefronts buried beneath a spreading blob of lava.

The movie includes close encounters with the lava in storm drains and subway tunnels and though you have the ubiquitous shot of the guy running with his clothes on fire, the casualties are far less than a good Schwarzenegger film.

City workers and volunteers race the clock to set up barricades to divert the menace from nearby neighborhoods.

Jones now enjoys the same movie status as Gene Hackman. He's good in whatever he's in, and he does hold together the dopest elements of the story. We could probably have done without the romantic interest between him and Heche, the young actress who played "Annie Brasco's" beleaguered wife.

The ultimate disaster of "Volcano" is the same one that befalls any movie with a battleacters that were important in an earlier draft make way for some other's concept.

Such is the fate of the self-centered entrepreneur whose Beverly Hills high rise plays a major role in battling the gusher. We don't even get the satisfaction of seeing his pride and joy topple (preferably on him) as much as the next guy, but just once I'd like to meet someone I believe is actually going through it all. Director James Cameron promises things will be different when his "Titanic" sails into theaters later this year, but my guess is that special effects, not plot points, have been the reason for all his last-minute tinkering.
