behavior is observed by the children (very few behaviors are not), they send a confused message and weaken the teaching they pass on. Parents, as primary teachers, must teach first of all by example, and accept this responsibility willingly. They must be willing to make the sacrifices necessary to offer a consistent example to their children.

Honesty, practice of religion and faith, respect for self and others, accepting responsibility for one's behavior, sacrificing short term satisfaction in the interest of long-term goals, self-discipline, thinking of others and not only the self and seeking the highest good are only a few areas that parents need to be ready to teach by example. "Do as I say, not as I do," doesn't work when it comes to passing good things on to children.

Moms and Dads, work hard to pass on good values to your children. Make it one of your most important responsibilities. Bevery clear what your values are and what is the basis for them. Teach your children not only what, but also why, these things are important. Make sure you have it clear in your own mind first.

My suspicion is that if you want to be honored, and ultimately remembered for something by your children, it will be for the good values you gave them. For this to happen, you have to be aggressive and strong in the values you teach. As the song says, wishing doesn't make it so. It comes from the consistent, enduring effort to teach and model, clear values while you have the chance.

God bless Moms and Dads for whom this is a major concern.
