Mel Gibson gets his 'Payback' in latest flick

If you're yearning to feel bruised, bloodied, and beaten-up, there's no need to visit the Kronk gym and volunteer as a sparring partner for an up-and-coming prizefighter. Instead, check out Mel Gibson's latest rock-em, sock-em flick, "Payback." By movie's end, you'll probably hurt all over.

In almost every scene, some wretched dreg of humanity gets shot, kicked, punched, whipped, stomped on, stabbed, carved, hammered, ripped, or burnt. For good measure, somebody dies from an overdose of dirty heroin too. Imagine a cinematic carnival of pain, and you will begin to get a bead on "Payback."

Gibson is Porter, a thief who has been double-crossed by his partner-in-crime, Val Resnick, a creepy sort played with just the right reptilian touch by Greg Henry (moviegobs may well remember his chilling drill bit in "Body Double"). Resnick not only swipes Porter's share of the duo's hoist money, but he also sets things up so that Porter's wife shoots her husband in the back, and leaves him to die. (One memorable close-up involves Resnick grinding out a cigarette in a glistening puddle of Porter's blood.)

But Porter doesn't die. At least, not physically. In a way, he's as indestructible as Bugs Bunny — though not nearly as reasonable. And ultimately, though it takes an attempt at a macabre humor now and then, this movie is no laughing matter.

After he recovers (following some sordid surgery that we witness up-close and personal), back he goes to the scene of the crime, discovering even more reason to see that his brand of justice is carried out.

When he declares that "nice guys always finish last," somehow we just know justice is going to be the vigilante. To say that he is fixated on recovering his share of the hoist money at this point is putting it mildly. Sure, he's going to have to get past the mob (here called "The Outfit") to do it, and wade through a heap of other human garbage as well. But he's past caring. He's like a machine, programmed to go after that $70,000, and anybody who gets in his way is going to be either (1) maimed or (2) dead.

Much of what is wrong with this picture has to do with Gibson's confusing, almost-robotic character. Who is this guy who's supposed to be our hero? He's not Dirty Harry Callahan. He's not Martin Riggs of "Lethal Weapon." He's not taxi driver, Travis Bickle. These were violent characters, but at least we knew enough about them to feel some of their pain. Porter, on the other hand, is not just a flawed individual, he often comes across like he's living a nightmare to which we have no real access. It's tiring. Then, it's tiresome. And, though Gibson struggles manfully with this odd role, eventually, we'd just like to go lie down someplace, very far away from this movie.

Drama: Mel Gibson stars as Porter and Maria Bello as Rosie in "Payback."

Director Brian Koppelman (who co-wrote the script with Terry Hayes) has assembled a supporting cast that deserves stronger showcasing. Just about all of the film's many villains especially make indelible marks. William Devane, leaning as only he can, takes a particularly chilling turn as a jackal-like, second-level syndicate boss. James Coburn, although on the screen in a brief appearance as another underworld kingpin, and provides some of the film's comic relief. ("Now, that's mean!" he splutters when Gibson's hair-trigger character blows a hole in one of his expensive attaché cases. "That's just mean!") The beat of the beastly bunch is Kris Kristofferson who, as the squinty-eyed, raspy-voiced head of The Outfit, is like evil in an expensive suit.

The cold, gray steel and hard edges of a modern-day megalopolis serve as an appropriate landscape for "Payback," enhancing the dark aura of the story. Director of photography Ericson Core's grainy imaging adds another harsh and effective
