Afternoon, intrigue, suspense, drama, describe two productions opening this week at Meadow Brook Theatre, and by the Jewish Ensemble Theatre in the Aaron DeRoy Theatre.

Meadow Brook presents the Michigan premiere of "Scotland Road," by Jeffrey Hatcher, through March 7.

Jewish Ensemble Theatre explores capital punishment, the media and judicial system in "Never the Sinner," by John Logan, which continues through March 7.

Both plays are edge-of-the-seat dramas where the audience isn't quite sure what will happen next.

David Ellenstein portrays John, the great grandson of John Jacob Astor, the richest man in the world when he perished with the Titanic in 1912.

Ellenstein's wife, Denise Michelle Young, plays a young woman found in the present day clinging to an iceberg in the Atlantic Ocean. She says only one word, "Titanic," and claims to be a survivor. She is wet, cold, and wearing clothes from 1912.

Astor intercepts the woman, who is on her way to a hospital in Boston, and questions her story.

"I am obsessed with every detail about the Titanic and preserving its pristine memory," said Ellenstein about his character. "The woman thinks she's in 1912."

Astor takes the woman to a clinic and interrogates her with help from Halberstadt, a female clinician portrayed by Susan Arnold, in an attempt to prove the woman is a fraud.

"It's not a play about the Titanic," said Ellenstein. "It's about loneliness, desperation, reincarnation. What it means to be alive at a certain time, or are we part of a collective unconscious?"

Ellenstein described "Scotland Road" as "a taut drama, that has a lot of twists and turns. It questions more than it answers," he said. "There's some humor, and it's fun trying to figure out what is going on. You're left guessing for a long time."

Young's character is silent during the first part of the play. "She refuses to speak," explained Young. "She's someone who was on the Titanic. It's part science fiction, part Twilight Zone. Much of the play is a mystery."

"Scotland Yard" takes place over a number of days. Astor tries to interrogate the woman, but she doesn't respond. "It's interesting how the relationships play out," said Young. "I really liked the part. She's an interesting, strong character. As things unfold it becomes more confusing."

Cutting edge dance company challenges rules

Bonu Ogan was a biology student at the University of North Carolina when she was recruited by the lord of the dance, Merce Cunningham.

"I had been in ballet dance and I was missing it, so I took a modern dance class. My teacher worshipped Merce and showed this videotape... I just fell in love with his ideas. The technique I thought was quite amazing."

Ogan gave up biology for dance and after graduation she went to New York where she eventually joined the Merce Cunningham Dance Company.

The company, now in a weeklong residence at the University of Michigan, will give performances Friday and Saturday at Ann Arbor's Power Center.

Cunningham, 73, is a legendary figure in modern dance, credited with changing the rules of dance as a dancer, beginning with Martha Graham in the early '40s, and as a choreographer who merged modern dance with new music and design.

"He broke away from traditional dance," Ogan said. "Dance had been narrative and he made it just pure movement. He separated music from dance and decor and then all the elements come together on opening night."

For Cunningham, dance was no longer tied to a literary concept or even to the rhythms and melodies of a com-

Benefit certain to make 'news'

Depending on the audience's response at this Sunday's Birmingham Bloomfield Symphony Orchestra concert, one local news anchor may never again be considered as "just a broadcast journalist."

Preceding the concert of "light and warm" classical music, honorary host Devin Scillian will serenade patrons with "Too Long in the Rain," a country style song written by the WDIV-TV news anchor.

News anchor turned crooner? Well, it might sound a bit surprising, but it's hardly a novel performance for Scillian, who has compiled a couple of commercial cassettes of his own work.

Families enjoy 'Sound of Music'

The set was half-finished behind Brooke Andress, and the rest of the actors playing the Von Trapp children during a rehearsal for "The Sound of Music," but that didn't seem to matter. They sang "These are a Few of My Favorite Things" as if it were opening night.

Like the Von Trapps, the Plymouth Theatre Guild prides itself on being a family affair. Brooke, who plays Liesl, is just one member of the Andress family involved with the production. Mom
