

Debate continues: Turn it off or keep it on?

MIKE WENDLAND

Should you turn it off or leave it on? I've been deluged with e-mails and calls to my WXYT weekend PC Talk radio show from people who have strong but differing views on the relative merits of keeping your computer turned on all the time, or turning it off at night or when you weren't using it.

The votes have been about split. Some users said power surges, power brownouts and nearby lightning strikes during thunderstorms had harmed their computers when left on and taught them a valuable lesson about turning it off and unplugging it.

Others say the wear and tear of turning on and off the equipment and thus heating up and cooling off the components unnecessarily shortened their lifespan.

For the record, I did some cost checking. Based on an Energy Cost Calculator at a utility Web site (<http://www.enrpub.com/info/energy2.htm#info>), it would cost about $7.11 a month to keep a typical home computer on 24 hours a day. If your printer is kept on all the time, too, add another $5.33 to the cost.

Run the calculations yourself based on hours on and power drain and you'll see, there indeed is a cost savings to turning your computer on when you need it. As far as a component wear and tear, that's pretty hard to measure.

What prompted all this discussion was my coming home the other day from a week-long, out-of-town trip to find my computer room filled with the smell of burning wires. Sure enough, a power supply transformer on one of my servers burned out. Fortunately, the PC just shut down without causing any fire or damage.

But it was a good reminder to be sure and have a smoke detector in your computer room. And as for me, when I'm around, my PC's are on all the time. When I'm away from home for extended periods of time, they're off. And all my equipment is protected by an Uninterruptible Power Supply unit. For info on power protection, check out the Web site (<http://www.apcc.com>) run by American Power Conversions.

Keystroke cops
Ever since the Wall Street Journal and MSNBC ran a story on surveillance software this past week, I've been deluged with e-mails asking if this is really true. The answer, as I've been warning here for months, is yes.

More and more employers are investing in surveillance software that lets them monitor or eavesdrop on everything their employees type on their computers, be it e-mail, Web site surfing or even word processing. Everything. Every keystroke, every deletion, every punctuation mark.

The most popular software there is called "Investigator" (<http://www.winwhatwhere.com/invest.htm>) and it costs just $99. Spouses are buying it to see if their husbands or wives are having cybersex with someone else. Parents are buying it to monitor their children's Internet activities and employers, by the score, are installing it to see how employees are spending their time on the office computer.

So far, over 6,000 customers, including many major corporations, have bought the software, and more and more companies are making similar applications. Bottom line is that you must assume that everything you do on your work computer can be read by your boss.

Check's in the mail
I've been pointing out how dubious some of those so-called "Free PC" offers that give you a computer at greatly reduced costs after an "Internet rebate." Besides the barrage of ads and Spam e-mail you'll get, besides the problem of being stuck with long-term dial-up contracts, there's another potentially more serious issue.

Some of these alleged rebates are apparently not being paid in a timely manner. That's according to a little-publicized class action suit filed last week against CompuServe. The suit claims that CompuServe failed to promptly remit rebate checks to consumers who purchased computers in expectation of $100 or $400 rebates. As many as 160,000 consumers may be affected. No comment from CompuServe. A special website (<http://www.web-access.net/~cesact/index.html>) has been set up to provide details of the suit.

Virus spreading fast
I'm not big on virus warnings but a virulent one called "Pretty Park" is really spreading. There are reports that dozens of government and corporate mail servers have been infected. I've already received eight e-mails infected with it. Some readers have written me saying they're getting even more.

The virus is really a Trojan Horse, and while it apparently does no real damage to a computer, it sends a copy of itself to everyone in the victim's e-mail address book every 30 minutes. It typically arrives in an e-mail from someone you know. The telltale sign is the e-mail contains the subject line "C:\Cool-Prgra\Pretty Park.exe."

There's an attachment. If you open it, you may see a picture of Kyle, one of the "South Park" TV series cartoon characters. But then if you do open it, it's too late. It starts sending everyone in your e-mail address book a copy of the virus. And because the e-mail seems to be sent by someone you know, many people are being tricked into opening the file.

If you get it, immediately trash the whole e-mail message without opening the attachment. Most anti-virus programs will eradicate it but, to be sure, don't open any e-mail attachments with any variation of the name "Pretty Park" just send them to the trash. If you feel you already have the Pretty Park virus, you can find a removal program at <http://www.web-access.net/>. Until next week, 73 everybody. PC Mike Wendland
