

MSU study on nursing homes reveals dissatisfaction

Results of a new survey released by Michigan State University's Institute for Public Policy and Social Research show that public perceptions regarding nursing home quality have become consistently more negative since 1997, despite increased satisfaction with the state's role in ensuring good quality care.

More than 80 percent of Michigan residents polled believe that withholding payment for care would be effective in improving quality of care. There is widespread support for a state bill that would allow a nursing home resident the right to withhold payment of care if a nursing home fails to meet public standards. Some 82 percent of adults surveyed believe withholding payment for care — funds would be held in an escrow account — would be either "very" or "somewhat" effective in improving the quality for long-term residents.

Persons living in southeastern Michigan are significantly more dissatisfied with the quality of nursing home care than are individuals from other parts of the state.

The survey was directed by Maureen Mickus, assistant professor of psychiatry, and Andrew Hogan, associate professor of medicine. More than 1,400 residents were asked their opinion about nursing home quality and their support of a number of different reform options.

The survey was one in a series of "State of the State" surveys conducted by the Institute for Public Policy and Social Research. The overall sampling error is plus or minus 3 percent.

The researchers found that concern about the quality of care is higher in some parts of the state than in others.

"The relatively high level of concern shown by Michigan residents living in the Thumb area may be a result of a number of criminal and civil charges against nursing home providers there," Mickus said. "We also found that residents of southeastern Michigan are relatively more concerned about the quality of nursing home care, perhaps because of some of the highly publicized nursing home closings in the greater Detroit area over the past few years."

"Women under 65 living in southeastern Michigan have the least favorable views of quality," she continued. "Given our understanding of the typical family caregiver, we speculate that this survey group probably represents adult daughters concerned about the care their aging parents receive or may receive in the future."

The survey revealed that Michigan residents are broadly supportive of measures to improve the quality of nursing home care. While a moderate level of support exists for increasing the state sales tax for this purpose, a large number of citizens expect nursing home owners to pay for, or at least share, the financing of improvements. Efforts to improve care in Michigan's 460 nursing homes have met with heated controversy. Advocates claim that care for nursing home residents is far less than adequate, citing a recent report by the U.S. General Accounting Office, the investigative arm of Congress. The GAO report concluded that one-fourth of the nation's nursing homes have serious deficiencies that place residents at high risk of severe injury or death. The report also concluded that efforts by state governments designed to correct deficiencies within facilities are currently ineffective.

Nursing home providers claim that family members of nursing home residents express high levels of satisfaction with care. They contend that the funds needed to improve care are lacking due to the 1997 Balanced Budget Act, which resulted in serious financial setbacks for nursing homes.
