Businesses honored for not selling

While leaving Monday night's Farmington Hills City Council meeting, Pony Express restaurant owner Richard Skinner proudly clutched a plaque with one hand and shook hands with police Chief William Dwyer with the other.

"This is a great idea," said Skinner to Dwyer, about the public recognition given to the Eight Mile Road establishment and approximately 40 other Hills businesses, including restaurants and stores.

They were honored for not providing underage decoys with alcohol, tobacco products — or other — during police department compliance operations last year.

"It's an excellent reminder and motivator" for businesses to stay on track, replied Dwyer to the restaurant owner.

According to Skinner, "This gives us something to put up on the wall and show our staff (and customers) that this is serious stuff. ... We got punished if we do something bad, but this gives us recognition for doing something good."

The plaques were co-awarded by the city, police department and Farmington/Farmington Hills Commission on Children, Youth and Families.

Most of this year's awardees have regularly complied with the Hills police department's alcohol and tobacco "sting" operations, which have taken place since 1986 and 1998.

Since those efforts began, the sales of alcohol and tobacco to minors have decreased significantly in Farmington Hills, Dwyer said.

At the beginning of the presentation, the Rev. Mark Summers, chairman of the commission, recalled how he and other children in his neighborhood regularly visited a store.

Summers said it was assuring that, whenever the store owner noticed youngsters involved in something they shouldn't be, he'd call parents to inform them about it.

"We'd like to re-enforce that attitude," Summers continued.

"And honor the businesses who have been responsible. We want to recognize their part in helping raise children in an honest and responsible manner."

In his comments to the council and awardees, Dwyer explained the importance of the business community keeping minors away from alcohol and tobacco.

"Seventy-five percent of smokers start by the time they are 18," Dwyer said. "The members of our business community have a big job, and you are on the line, charged with the responsibility and accountability to stop minors from purchasing alcohol or tobacco. At one time or another, you have probably saved a youngster" from serious injury, death or health-related consequences.
