FEW MEN ACHIEVE SUCCESS WITHOUT THAT QUALITY.

Let the Man Who Feels He Can Do Worthy Things Force Himself to Accomplish Them,

Let the Man Win Feels He Gan be Worthy Things Force Himself to Accomplish Them.

All men, speaking in round numbers, have capacity, but perhaps there is no one thing which individual men understand so little as their true native cupacity. In practice it is easy to find one man overestimating his ability while apacity in the most cyting and often one not overestimating and often one, of the most roulish most common—one his attitude near the former is one of the most cyting and often one, of the most roulish appearing members of society. The one who underestimates his capacity may at the same time have an exaggerated notion of his rights. Such a combination is more than likely to unfit him for finding the places where his litent capacity might expand.

There are many people whom we are accustomed to call bright persons who never compet themselves to put a thing through. It goes without saying that they are often necessitious the control of the controls that keep them from failing by the wayside. With good natural ability they have an exaggerated self-consciousness which makes them constantly declare that they are one ability. They will tell you that they could do it "It." Some-condition is always hindering them. They never by any circumstance master condition. They bring up children who have no more determination than a popiar leaf. They are in every respect the absolute antithesis of Spariance. Sordian knots do not inspire them to griginal solution. But they they have an election of conduct. They skip ail tangles.
