Suttle

focus on the solution. "Patty, the dog ate your vegetables. I expect you to eat them yourself."

What else can be done to encourage truthful behavior?

■ Do look for teachable moments to talk about the consequences of lying. Pick a calm time when there is no conflict, perhaps during a snack, while driving, or after a bedtime story. Kids are less likely to tune you out or become defensive if you pick a peaceful time to talk about difficult issues.

■ Do use resources, like books, movies, or life events to illustrate the effects of lying. Pinocchio and The Boy Who Cried Wolf are examples of stories that provide an opportunity to discuss your beliefs and values.

■ Do respond to lies by expressing their wish that it hadn't happened, and point out what needs to be done. For example, "I can see that you wish you hadn't knocked down the plant. What needs to be done now is to scoop up all the dirt and sweep the floor."

■ Do model truthful behavior. Give kids clear messages about what is acceptable to you and what is not, then show them from your own example.

Kids do tell lies at one time or another. By handling their lies with wisdom and sensitivity, you can give kids the courage they need to be truthful.
