Try these tips for shooting photos from the sky

For all of you who have been in an airplane, you know how different and exciting things look from the air. Bulldings are miniaturized, either in front or behind a wing. Set your camera's focusing ring at infinity and the shutter speed control at 1/500 second or faster. Because depth-of-field in aerial photography is normally insignificant, a wide aperture is usually what you'll use in order to obtain as fast a shutter speed as possible. Make sure you don't bract the camera against the window or you'll pick up the vibrations of the plane. Better still, be sure your arms don't touch the plane either, so your body nets as a "shock absorber" against vibrations.

What film should you use What film should you use from the air? Because extremely fast shutter speeds are mandatory, faster films are usually called for. Kodak T-Max 400 is a good black and white choice while Ektachrome 200 or Kodacolor 200 are good color selections depending on whether you desire slides or prints. Remember when you fly shutter speed negated the airpiane's vit commercially, never allow your lilm to pass through airport x-ray devices. Most security personnel will gladly accommodate a request for a visual inspection of film.

Use a slylight or UV filter at all times to cut through haze. Be careful in the use of a polarizer filter, however, when shooting color from an airliner. It may interact with the polarizing characteristics of the plastic window material and result in out of focus color bands in your pictures.

Use a yellow filter for black and white film. If haze is particularly bad, switch to a red filter. Because contrast is reduced in aerial photography, you'll have to overdevelop your film to put snap back into negatives. Have your camera ready and listen for the pilot to identify famous landmarks such as the Grand Canyon, Hoover Dam, and Niagara Falls. Such locations photograph very well from the air. Other subject to look for are dramatic sunsets, sonevcapped mountains, and look for are dramatic sunsets, snowcapped mountains, and city skylines. Look for patterns in plowed farmlands or checkerboard fields. Be on the lookout for abstract shots, too.

Your friends may have to guess' what your photo really is.
If the opportunity exists, don't overlook other means of aerial photogruphy. Light planes and helicopters can give you greater control over direction and elevation. They can bring you closer to the subject and give you that special angle you may want. You'll be more fleable in time of day, too. Late afternoon or early morning will produce shadows and textures not obtainable with a mid-day sun.

Some of the best aerial shots can be taken from a hot air bal-perspective is excellent.

Aerial photography will reward you with many different and exciting pictures. So let your photographic growth take off --- into the air!
