Troy man switches parties, will challenge Knollenberg as a Democrat

BY GARY WINKELMAN
STAFF WRITER

Bart Baron hopes the third time's the charm. A Troy resident with designs on Washington, D.C., Baron announced last week his intent to run for Joe Knollenberg's seat in Congress.

The 60-year-old businessman lost his bid to unseat U.S. Rep. Sander Levin in 2000 and was bested by Knollenberg in the Republican primary last year. Knollenberg went on to beat attorney David Fink in the general election for the redrawn 9th Congressional District.

As he eyes the 2004 election, Baron has switched political parties and plans to take on Knollenberg as a Democrat.

a Democrat. In a written statement, Baron said his concerns include trade issues and a health care system that leaves millions of people uninsured. He also said he favors cutting government spending before cutting taxes and believes illegal immigration threatens the United States "from a terror and sov-

Baron

Baron said his reason for running is to better the lives of his children and grandchildren. He said, however, this will be his last campaign.

"I am person who sincerely believes that one person can make a difference," he said. "It's time to forget partisan politics and look at the person and the needs of our district. If we continue the current rate of blue and white collar job loss in the automotive industry and manufacturing sectors of our economy to unfair foreign competition, then the refrain of the early '80s may arise again: 'would the last person to leave Michigan please turn off the lights.'"

The district includes Troy, Rochester, Rochester Hills, Royal Oak, Clawson, Birmingham, Bloomfield Hills, Bloomfield Township, West Bloomfield, Oakland Township, Pontiac, Auburn Hills, Farmington, Farmington Hills, half of Orion Township and other communities.
