

'Heed County Bankers' Warning; 14 Terms Enough For One Man'-Sparks

"The County morgue idea recently proposed would be expensive and directly contrary to the economy warning to County officials last Friday by the Oakland County Bankers' Association," says Garnet M. Sparks, coroner candidate. He also declares that "I believe the people of Oakland County agree with me that 28 years in office, which one of the present coroners has had, is enough." Mr. Sparks is one of the leading candidates for coroner on the Republican ticket, at the primary September 9.

"Every taxpayer will agree with the opinion expressed last week by Oakland County's leading bankers, that the County must cut expenditures to the very minimum to halt increases in taxation," says Mr. Sparks. "The County does not need a morgue if it elects as coroners, men who are sufficiently equipped to take care of the needs of the office. Building a morgue would probably cost at least $50,000, and three additional salaries on the County payroll for maintenance. There are enough regularly-maintained ambulances in the County now to handle the work, if it is properly organized."

"Another way in which economy can be achieved in the Coroner's office is to hold no unnecessary inquests. I would cut them to the absolute minimum. Still another"

GARNET M. SPARKS means economy and efficiency would be to secure the co-operation of local justices of the peace to act for the coroner in their own communities, thereby reducing mileage costs and delays of long trips to and from various parts of the County. Local officials and morticians are competent and can often be the most helpful to the families involved when a situation arises in which the coroner is needed."

A Man From the North

By DUFORD JENNE

(Copyright)

JENN read the letter and tossed it carelessly to her roommate.

"Ann, here's a chance for one of your informal practical jokes," she suggested, her cold eyes hiding in their darkness a faint twinkle. "That's from Allan Kerr. I met him last summer up North. He was handsome enough but a bit crusty in appearance—said he was camping on the lake and he looked it; and besides, he was poor. The man who interests me is the boy who can pay the waiter's check without tossing it if he wondered how much it cost him."

Ann smiled as she picked up the letter. "Your bright idea, let me, is for me to carry on your correspondence with him; is that it?"

"He writes a dandy letter, and you can string him along; and when I go up there next year, I can have him to play around with."

"Jean, you are heartless!"

"Mebbe, little one, but this is a heartless age."

Ann, amused over the letter. It was chatty and interesting, and suddenly, as she was in the habit of making decisions, she decided to answer it. Jean informed her, immediately, that Allan had not seen her handwriting, the box would work.

Ann wrote the reply, employing some of Jean's very characteristic phrases, amused and pleased herself at the way her letter shaped itself.

A week later Allan's reply came, and Ann learned something of his life. It seemed he was working to a lighter camp, and the letter told of his life there.

The letters began to interest her keenly, although she took care to keep the discovery from Jean. Jenn found the letters only mildly interesting and soon stopped reading them.

Slowly a personal note crept into the letters. Before she realized it, the same mood was upon her.

"Here's a pretty how-do-do!" Ann told herself one evening. "Writing Jean's letters to a chap who evidently is thinking of her tenderly, while I'm beginning to think of him in the same way! I'll drop him!"

But she found it much easier to say it than to do it.

Jean left for a two weeks' trip for her firm, and with her bright, somewhat cynical presence, absent from the room, Ann found it easier to dream and muse over the man to whom she was writing.

Jenn had been gone only a few days when Ann went to the door to learn from the maid that "A man from the North" would like to see Jean.

Ann was stunned. "But she isn't here, Kate!"

Kate grinned. "He said if Jean wasn't here, he liked to see any friend of hers."

Ann thought, "Send him up, Kate," she said with decision, but her mind was fluttering.

Ann went to the window. A long, powerful looking stranger stood at the curb. "It can't be Allan," she told herself.

The door opened into their living room, and a man, brown of face, and almost filling the doorway, faced her. "I am sorry to learn that Jean is away, but glad that you are here." His gray, fine eyes were friendly.

"You see, I'm right from the woods, hungry for a good time, and I hope you will run around with me a little—some plays, dances, etc."

Ann laughed inwardly as she thought of the joke on Jean.

They did play around—a gay sojourn week. He seemed to have plenty of money that he spent freely but wisely, and he certainly was a good pal.

"Oh, this is awful!" Ann moaned one night, as she tossed her evening dress aside. "I'm in love with him and he's in love with Jenn! And when Jenn gets here—Gosh! what a mix-up!"

She saw no solution, but one came the next evening. They were at a corner table in one of the delightful places he knew. He had been musing a bit.

"Ann, I was lonely up North at the camp. You see, my father owns the business, and I was up there winning back after a bad dose of pneumonia. The letters that came, so cheery, amusing, pulled me out of dark hours; I made up my mind that the girl who wrote them should play with me and be with me all the rest of my life. Now are you willing?"

Ann ceased to breathe. "But—my dear—how did you know I wrote the letters? I—reply?"

A strong, steady hand lay upon her trembling one. "Through a friend I learned that Jenn had gone on a business trip, but the letters came from you at about just the same; and besides, the last of the letters sounded to me—well—as I know you now," he said gently.

"But Jenn—" she began.

"The point of it is—do you care a bit for me?" he said quietly.

The somewhat dirty world around her cleared. She was looking into the strong but tender face of the man she loved. She let her hand turn and clasp his.

"Allan, I do—since your first letter."
