

Sue and Her Needed Sun Bath

By DOROTHY DOUGLAS

SUE stepped into the torrid air of the tropical plants of the park, with the one who performs a act that could be held as suspicious. In other words, Sue sneaked in.

She found a spot where the sun beat mercilessly down from its glare of mid-July and sat down on her small camp stool. She then tumbled in a bag for a tidy package of sandwiches and a sketch book and pencil. She managed to get the pencil naturally but the sketch book and pencil seemed unfamiliar tools in her slender hands.

In removing her blue and gold hat, Sue released a mass of curls that a baby might envy, so soft and silky they were. She began idly sketching a tropical tree. She selected it because there were clumps of it hanging about and very large leaves. It looked fairly easy to draw.

The only other occupant of the way-grazing bungalow was a young man with the coolest term corner-be could find and was mopping his brow and longing for the refreshing sensation of an lead shower bath. He was sketching. It became there of tropical plants with the fineness and the gifted touch of an artist. Sue had crept in so quietly that Pen, as he was called in artistic circles, did not know of her arrival. It was a disagreeable, hacking little cough, reaching his ears from time to time that told him that another soul was sharing his enforced noising in the tropical plant house.

Then he peered from among the ferns and saw what he supposed to be a child of fifteen or so. Sue didn't look a day older. She was, however, twenty-one.

Had Pen realized that Sue had reached that advanced age, he would not have approached her so carelessly to have a chat. Sue looked up with great blue eyes as he stood beside her, and would have hidden her sketch had he permitted it. "It'd like to see it," said Pen, such as if he were talking to a very young woman.

"It's not very good," she said, and handed him the drawing. Sue had never spoken a true word. Pen hit his lip in an effort not to smile outright. "I think you have made the figs a bit too big—

Unveils Tablet by Transatlantic Call

His Excellency the Earl of Bessborough, Governor General of Canada, is shown at his desk at Government House, Ottawa, about to read his speech in connection with the unveiling of a tablet at the London Power House in commemoration of Michael Faraday, who 100 years ago announced his discovery of electromagnetic induction. Lord Bessborough's speech was transmitted to London via the transatlantic telephone service.

"Dutch Treat" Makes a Hit With Modern Girl To the young man who writes to ask if it is proper to let the girls pay for their dinner at a restaurant...

Experiments have been made in this direction, but somehow or other they did not work. Even when the girls propose the idea it doesn't make a bit with them if the boys take them too literally in the final settlement. Post-privy, the girls don't like it. Many of the modern women are more conservative than men, and one of her inherited privileges is to say that the woman pays while she sees that the men do it.

Of course, when the girls suggest a Dutch treat the whole thing is seen to fall in with the idea, and then to buzz your own girl into granting you the very special favor of letting her pay her shot. You can do this in the strictest confidence and with the safe promise not to tell anyone. You won't have to tell. The chances are you won't have to tell. The chances are you won't have to tell. The chances are you won't have to tell.

Bear's Propensity Hugging Termed Myth The proverbial hugging propensity of bears is probably a myth, notwithstanding a vast amount of literature, reference books and works on natural history contain numerous references to the "crabbing embrace" or "deathly hug" of bears. For instance, says Mrs. W.C. Neely all careful observers are agreed that this notion is erroneous. It probably arose from faulty observation.

Of the national magazines especially devoted to the gate at all, women and largely written by them I discover none which applies even a moderately civilized degree of editorial restraint in the matter of purposeless teaching or encouragement except from each other—have evolved their own idiom in the quotation mark, the exclamation point, the dash, the underline. So instinctive is many a woman's use of these devices when no man would think of using them that they actually bear their own exclamation mark in their own mouths. In the first place, said Sue, "you may as well be straight as you are."
