Doctor Savage's Dilemmas

By DORA MASON

(By McGraw-Hill Newspaper Syndicate)

YOUNG Doctor Savage was not so much worried about his patient as he was about his patient's daughter. And Enid was quite enough to trouble anyone and had succeeded, at her eighteenth year, in driving her lovely mother to the very borders of nervous prostration.

And because, beneath her selfish exterior, there was the making of a charming woman as her mother was, Doctor Savage felt unable to cope adequately with the case. Had he discovered the selfishness before he became a victim to the charm in his way would have been the easier.

And since selfishness was the one characteristic that a doctor's wife most certainly must not have—the problem was a vexed one. So vexed, in fact, that the young doctor took his entire trouble to his much older partner and they talked the thing out frankly.

"Where's the girl's father that he doesn't take her over his knee and give her a sound spanking?" questioned the older doctor.

"Mrs. Walker has been a widow since the girl was ten. It's a case where, I fancy, the man's mind was needed—if not his slipper. Mrs. Walker is too sensitive, gentle and feminine to guide this modern type of girl—they need a restraining hand these days or there's no telling where enviro' ment will lead them."

"So you want me to take over this case, minister to the mother and at the same time make an ultra modern young lady into one that might in time fill the role of a doctor's wife. Is that about it?"

"Exactly!"

"Rather a tall order, my boy."

"She's worth it, though."

"Who? Mother or daughter?"

"Both," said the young doctor.

When Doctor Ward made his first appearance in the sick room in place of the young man, Enid pouted quite frankly, but in the eyes of the mother sprang a look of relief as if unconsciously her troubles had tapered from her own shoulders to those of the big kindly doctor.

And he had not been on the case a week before he took the daughter aside and talked to her like the proverbial Dutch Uncle.

"Now look here, young lady," he said, in his kindly but none the less determined way, "you've got to be a bit more considerate of your mother's views of what is good for your welfare. Do you ever stop to realize that your mother has lived twenty years longer than you have and that she knows volumes more than you do about what is good and what is not good for a child of eighteen?"

"Mother's old fashioned," stated Enid, but the doctor's voice interrupted her.

"But not old fashioned enough to be driven into serious illness by her own daughter—is she?"

"You're wearing down your own mother's nerve force by continual disobedience to her wishes. She quite naturally sees no virtue in developing in you through dancing half the nights, wearing one-half enough clothing and smoking far too many cigarettes—I think most sensible people would agree with her—don't you, my dear?"

Then suddenly Enid burst into tears and wept uncontrollably on Doctor Ward's broad shoulder. He smiled softly as he patted her into calmness for he knew that victory was his.

"I didn't, didn't realize—I—I—was so selfish and silly—I love mamma more than anyone else in the world," and Enid sobbed afresh, but soon the sunlight came into her eyes and her lips smiled. "You must think me very weak and foolish to cry," she finally said and caressed the lapels of his coat.

"No, my dear—I only think the real, true woman is beginning to—to sprout."

"And you'll help me to grow—more like my mother?"

"It won't take long at this rate," laughed Doctor Ward and felt very much elated—so much so, in fact, that when he and his young partner met at dinner he told him all about it.

"Do you think so sudden a change will be lasting?" questioned Doctor Savage earnestly but with much hope in his eyes.

"If she falls in love with the right man now—at this stage of the game I think she may develop into a semblance of the woman her mother is. If there were many women in this world like Mrs. Walker—we men would be a much finer lot than we are."

"Then—"

"Exactly. Now that our patient is swiftly throwing off her need of medical attention I am going to bombard her with such attentions of another order as to make your courtship of Enid seem like a sham affair altogether."

"When I can catch my breath," laughed Savage, "I will tell you that I think I am a fairly good imitation of Cupid. There's no doubt that our dilemmas often prove blessings in there!"
