"What do you mean?" roared Durtow.
"You see, sir we've been instructed not to bother you with detail, but to get result; so I, as sales manager, went ahead and got results. But I must confess that were it not for this young man and his suggestion—I've offered him a permanent position in my department, but he has declined sures he could find in town, and got politons on their windows, and such time as the stores were retred. He got the Chamber of Commerce to back him, on the theory that vacant stores were a very embarrassing reminder of business depression, and would look hetter if they had something in their display windows anyway; sort of gave the town a cheerful air. The young man rented the store windows for next to nothing representing that a display would draw the attention and been drawn courd undow times if the light he easier to find a tenant. What sort of frameup have you two been—"
Walter grinned at Slimpkins. "He thinks lit's a frameup," Walter told him, "because just the other night he told me I couldn't make a thousand dollars by houest means in a year; and when I said I could, he told me If I old he'd, give me ten for every dollar I made housestly my fest six months out of school. He now owes me twently-four thousand dollars." "You fool!" Durrow roared at Simphins, "you've cost me more than the profits on our balance sheet. Get out of my sight." Simphins beat a hasty retreat.
Durrow stared at his offspring almost in apoplexy; but the offspring had understood that stare since child-hood.
