Bell System Switchboards Link Teletypewriters in Wide Network

Above is shown a new type of switchboard where teletypewriters are interconnected for the transmission of written information just as telephone calls are switched for voice communication. The operator is making a connection at the switchboard, in response to the call which has just come in on the teletypewriter in front of her. In the oval is a teletypewriter in use.

The recent development of a switchboard via interconnected teletypewriters—machines which send and receive typewritten messages electrically by wire—now makes possible the exchange of written information among subscribers on a nationwide basis, with the same speed and in much the same way that present telephone switchboards interconnect one telephone user with another for local or long distance conversations anywhere in the Bell System.

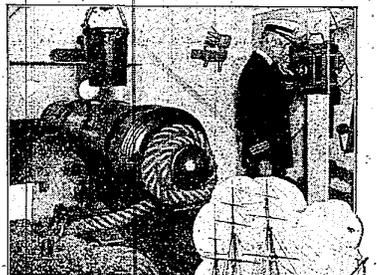

Send and Receive at Will

A subscriber who wishes to send a typewritten message to another subscriber, wherever located, simply types out on his own machine the call number of the other subscriber. This number appears instantly before the operator at the teletypewriter switchboard, and she establishes, through the switchboard, the connection between the two teletypewriters. Once the two subscribers are connected by wire in this way, they may send and receive typed messages as desired, at the speed of electrical communication and without regard to distance.

Resemble Ordinary Typewriters

Teletypewriters look and are operated like ordinary typewriters. But as each key of one machine is struck, in the course of typing a message, it sends an electrical impulse over the wire which causes the other machine to imprint the same letter. Thus, a message typed on the one machine is also typed on the other simultaneously, and identical copies are produced on both machines. Carbon copies may be made, forms may be filled in, and the machine may be used, in connection with the service, for practically all the other purposes for which an ordinary typewriter is used.

Old Ironsides Still Sails On

Restored to her former glory and her original condition, the historic U. S. S. Constitution is again afloat, proceeding from port to port so that Americans may see this bulwark of their country's first navy. Her keel laid in 1794, the scourge of the Barbary pirates and the conqueror of the Guerriere, she preceded the clipper ship era of the American merchant marine, and is one of the oldest vessels afloat. But modern efficiency demands some concessions, and the photograph above shows Old Ironsides' captain, Commander Louis J. Gulliver, U. S. N., talking over a telephone below decks, while at his back is one of the big guns of her famous armament, with a leather water bucket swinging above it. Right: The Constitution as she is today.

Telephone Call to Roumania Unites Long Separated Family

After telephone service between this country and Roumania had been formally opened by a conversation between Secretary of State Blinnon in Washington and Prince Ghika, Roumanian Minister of Foreign Affairs, in Bucharest, a call was placed by Edward Altman, of New York, for his father in the little town of Cernault, Roumania. Father and son had not spoken together for more than twenty years, and they conversed for several minutes. Altman also talked with his sisters, while at his end of the circuit his cousin, his wife, and his father-in-law listened to the conversation through specially installed receivers. The call covered a distance of over 5,000 miles.
