THE OPEN DOOR

By DOROTHY DOUGLAS

"MY DEAR," advised Edna's mother, "you would be a very foolish girl not to accept your mother's plan to take the trip to London and wants you to go with him. It will give you a chance to meet many men on board ship and I do not doubt you will come back quite ready to meet George Danbury."

"I know I ought to love him, mother, and I hope so, perhaps, do a lot for Edward—but I just can't make up my mind."

"It is different my daughter," accused Mrs. Walker, "but after all George is a thoroughly good man, has heaps of money, and I think you would be happy with him in a year or two."

"I don't think so," Edna replied. "I suppose it is much the same, in a few years time, so long as one married and considerate type of man."

"So Edna went on the trip with Uncle Henry. George Danbury sent her neat steamer trunks and baskets of fruit on the day of departure and Edna felt reasonably sure that upon her return she would give him the promise he wanted. But deep in her heart she knew that the great thing called love was not in her life and that lack of money had her little brother's crippled state were the reasons for her decision.

She met many men on board ship and would herself study them and comparing them with George Danbury as a possible future mate. She was using all her wisdom over the trying problem but the more she tried to see the future the more confused it became.

They reached London safely and Uncle Henry was obliged to tend business much of the time. Consequently Edna was left to her own devices.

The idea of going back to New York and marrying George troubled her night and day. She felt that Edward might be cured if she could pay for the services of a great specialist. Every crippled man she saw stabbed her, for Edna could see little Edward growing up a helpless cripple and she herself in a position to perhaps prevent it.

Edna found herself frequently visiting the wonderful old churches—St. Paul's, Westminster, St. James—and finding in the shadowed silent walls a great amount of spirit. She felt her feet lead her into the field of old St. Martin's in the field that church whose doors are never shut, night or day, to the worn and weary. Human drivings, food, rest and help through the dark night.

Edna slipped in softly and found a seat in a darkened corner. A great surge of emotion swept over her and she made her confession of a tremendous and wonderful power working within the walls of that old church. There was tragedy, despair, poverty, scared faces. Yet, underneath and round about all a spirit of exaltation.

She went down on her knees and found herself praying for enlightenment, seeking the path which she should take and thereby do the most good during her span of life. She prayed, too, for those other poor souls that were so utterly, hopelessly dejected.

Edna found herself weeping softly. She didn't know the why—but perhaps she felt that a way was being opened up for her to follow. Perhaps she had drawn nearer her God and he was showing her a path.

She did not start when she felt the young curate's hand on her lightly, understandingly, on her shoulders, but she looked up and into the most kindly eyes she had ever seen—sympathetic and kindly and kindly asking for the reason of her weeping.

She had watched him going slowly about the church, offering words of help here and a bit of money there—a man happy in the performance of his duty.

Before Edna knew it she was telling him about her problems and her crippled brother and anxiety and all that her marriage to a rich man meant to all members of her family.

He listened to edly as one used to the outpourings of the heart and all the time Edna felt herself being drawn toward him.

"This is a tremendous sacrifice you are asking of yourself," the young curate admitted, "marriage without love. But, on the other hand, pure love matches are not always happy. So many people seek personal happiness in marriage rather than looking upon it as the stepping stone toward the fulfillment of a greater destiny."

With such sudden comprehension, her big eyes that the young curate smiled. He had not underestimated the worth of this young girl who had sought light in old St. Martin's to the Field. His work had made of him a keen reader of human possibilities. "You would not be here," he added gently, "if you were one who could marry for money and what it can give. I think you love this chap—love him with so big a love that you have been afraid of it—afraid that you could not give him measure for measure. But that he would stand between you, and I think that he is just giving you time to realize all this."

The young curate passed on down the aisle of the church and Edna felt she followed him with an intense glow of happiness in them. He had unlocked and opened the great doors of love for her to enter, and somewhere in the soft silence she saw the reflected smile of Danbury's eyes.

Profit Of $4,500 For Bank Is Announced

Items of repair, on properties covered by mortgages, or owned by the bank. Taxes and fire insurance must, of course, be paid to protect the assets and the interests of the depositors.

"One of the hardest problems which the receivership has to contend with is the apparent lack of a sense of responsibility shown by many of the debtors, who, while possibly not in a position to pay off their indebtedness in full, do have assets and incomes and could at least make reasonable monthly payments. A program of this kind would benefit them, inasmuch as their liabilities would be continually reducing and would benefit the creditors as the funds therefrom could be used for the payment of dividends. I would like to impress upon such individuals their responsibility to the community in these days of depression and urge them to do their small bit toward the liquidation of the assets of this bank, and save expense of court costs which would be incurred through forced collection."
