"The True Physician" (Exchange)

The true physician has in him a certain quality. He has a vast sympathy for sick people, a vast pity for the poor and the helpless. So he is imposed upon, for most human beings are alert to note quick and unstinted sympathy, and are not at all averse to trading upon it.

And the doctor, who knows human beings so much better than they know themselves, is, somehow, neither shocked, distressed nor made bitter by evidence of ingratitude.

* * *

Few persons realize how hard earned is the doctor's competence, which, nine times out of ten, is surprisingly modest. He is the last relic of civilized slavery.

He goes to the theater, telling himself he shouldn't because Old Lady Gazookis is in the hospital and she's just the sort to whom a minor gas pain will mean a capital operation.

The doctor leaves his seat number and name at the box office, and in the middle of the second act an usher comes and whispers that the doctor is wanted on the telephone. And it's Old Lady Gazookis!

If a doctor is the proprietor of a half decent practice, he seldom takes a meal in peace, and in his middle years, with what hastily eaten meals and broken rest and overwork, he surrenders to anginal pectoris, the scourge of the medical profession, and a youthful hopeful steps into his practice and goes the same route in the fullness of time.

Doctors and army and navy officers have in them something of the same holy zeal of a monk. Their professions call for a renunciation of worldly wealth and place; they work for the joy of the job and get little thanks and much criticism for it, and are never really appreciated until a grave emergency arises.

I am much in favor of doctors. The only one I never liked was an army medic who got a private by the name of Kyne mixed up with another private by the name of Klein, and slipped Kyne 3 large breakers of epson salts intended for Klein. At that the poor doctor was terribly sorry, and I suppose Kyne would have forgiven him if

THE HIRED MAN TRICK (Exchange)

Here is a fable: Once upon a time a farmer had a hired man who tried to make himself popular by treating his employer. Sometimes this liberal-spending young man would take his boss on a veritable spree that cost many dollars. Came a day when the farmer discovered that the money came from his own pockets. The crafty hired man had access to the old sock in which the farmer kept his cash.

A story somewhat like this may be read between the lines of the recently issued report of the public printer of the United States government. A million dollars' worth of books and pamphlets comprising 25,360,900 pages, were designed for sale or free distribution during the past few years have been sold for waste paper. Millions of copies of government publication are "alotted to members of congress regardless of the special needs of their respective states or district." Last year while the government was running a half dollar deficit in the cost of running the government, congressmen used 25,360,900 envelopes in mailing out free of postage copies of their speeches. At the same time the postmaster general, bewailing the deficit in his department, was pleading for an increase of letter postage from 2 to 3 cents.

The hired man was robbing his employer's pockets to give him a treat.—Tynald (S. D.) Tribune.

he hadn't been suffering from tropical dysentery at the time. Some sentimentalist (I suspect he was a florist) invented Mother's Day. I believe we ought to have Doctor's Day, and on that day send in our checks for all we owe our doctor in cash and try to express something of what we owe him for the money that money we buy.—Percy B. Kyne in Chicago Herald and Examiner.
