On Top of the Bus

By FLORENCE ELLIOTT

THERE was a touch of fall in the air. It was brisk and refreshing on the upper deck of the New York bus as it whisked its way along Riverside drive.

Not many people had taken advantage of the clear freshness of the open air. But there were two children watching eagerly for the unusual either on the Hudson or along the streets. Two seats behind them sat a man and a woman. The woman, a pleasant looking individual, was obviously disturbed.

"You know as well as I do, the children and I can't live on that."

Across the aisle the two small boys were jumping up and down; gay animated little figures.

"Oh, mother!" shrieked the younger one, rattling overhead, "a delightful ride. No attention was paid by the older people to the youngster.

The man's voice was low. "It's a wonder I'm able to attend to business with all the complicated racket for the crate homes," he said, "let alone the children. Their training is mainly your job, anyway."

"Well," she went on, "as I told you, the children and I can't possibly live on the amount you propose."

"You don't seem to realize I'm giving you practically all I make," the man reminded her.

"I notice you're not giving up any of your club," she pointed out. "Why should I?" he retorted. "What do you expect me to do with my evenings? Spend them in the movies?"

"No, I don't expect you to spend your evenings in the movies. I expect you'll spend them right where you've been spending them for the past seven months."

"I fall to see why you have to drag Grace into this," he muttered. "You know very well my seeing her was merely on business. She needed legal advice and I gave it to her."

"In all due respect, Tom, Grace had very odd moments for needing advice, legal or otherwise. After all, you have office hours, you know."

The man was indignant. "Just because she received a beastly telegram from that wretched husband of hers, and wanted to know what to do, you call it odd moments. It was only during dinner."

She sighed. "That's always the way with Grace, Tom. Only this, only that. As though Grace out of the entire city's women needed special advice about her husband."

"I suppose a husband should feel delighted to come home every night and find an infatuated doctor draped around the house!"

"Tom!" She turned to him almost fiercely, but then laughed—seeing how sullen his face was. "You're nothing but a child yourself!"

She paused before continuing in a more serious tone. "That was one of the reasons I spoke about having more to live on. Not for myself, but Junior isn't any too robust."

The man searched her face. A surprised, alarmed expression spread across his regular, clear-cut features.

She continued a little sulkily. "The doctor says I'll have to be taking him away every now and then. Drier climate, higher altitude."

The man would have interrupted but she held on. "The reason you've seen Doctor French draped around the house so often."

"But you never told me anything about it!" the man exclaimed. He looked hurriedly across the aisle at his younger son. The lad was a little pale.

"You never gave me a chance, Tom. If you looked tired when you came home I'd decide to tell you later. And then sometimes I'd have to call Doctor French and aside from being barely child to him you wouldn't talk to me for days. So you see I kept postponing it."

Tom was deep in reverie. "All I could think of was that he'd once wanted you to marry him," he muttered.

"You seem to forget I married you," she reminded him.

"You mean you're not interested in him. You're not . . . ?"

"Tom, you idiot!"

He was beaming. "Jenn, take the kids to some ranch and summer and let me go along, too."

But Jenn could not resist a final thrust. "What about Grace? She'll be needing advice most of the time, and a ranch is no place to commute from."
