

At 100 She Keeps Up with the World

Mrs. Mary Brigham, of Rockville, Conn., recently celebrated her hundredth birthday. Although she has seen a century of change and progress, her mind remains modern and the things that are new have a constant appeal to her. Her two greatest pleasures in life are motoring, and holding conversations by telephone with her many friends. Shortly after her hundredth birthday, she replaced her desk telephone, which she had been using for years, with one of the more convenient hand telephones.

Perhaps the most that can be said for the present system is that it may look a little more dignified to come staggering out of a restaurant than an old-fashioned saloon.

Chemist's Hobby Brings New Means Of Extracting Vitamin in Quantity

R. B. Williams, left, director of chemical research in the Bell Telephone Laboratories, and R. B. Waterman, an associate. After a number of years of experimentation carried on as a spare-time interest, Mr. Williams, with the assistance of Mr. Waterman and others, has succeeded in developing a method for the quantity production of Vitamin B from rice bran.

Twenty years ago, while working Williams is now able to extract five grams of Vitamin B. He recently exhibited some of the crystals to the Federation of the American Societies of Experimental Biology in New York City. Although Vitamin B has been isolated on a laboratory scale before, this was the first announcement of a commercial process. The efficiency of extraction is several times greater than has ever been obtained before.

Uses Fuller's Earth, Quinine
The method of extraction uses the mysterious force called adsorption. To a first extract from the rice bran, Mr. Williams adds the mineral powder called fuller's earth. The tiny particles of this have some powerful attraction for the molecules of the vitamin, which promptly leave the solution and stick to the particles of powder.

The next problem is to get these vitamin molecules loose again. Out of hundreds of ways which have been tried to loosen the vitamin, the most successful one so far discovered is to do it with ordinary quinine. Quinine sulphate is added to a watery mixture of vitaminized fuller's earth. For some reason which is another mystery, the molecules of quinine displace the vitamin molecules, so that the vitamin is left free in the solution, from which it can be concentrated and crystallized.

Doses Are Exceedingly Small
So powerful is this crystallized vitamin in preventing or curing beriberi and related nervous conditions, either in men or in animals that the necessary doses are measured in micrograms, one microgram being about one thirty-millionth of an ounce.

Physicians are reported to be testing the effects of doses of the vitamin on cases of malnutrition in children and on other human disorders.
Habits of Bre's 'Possum
Bre's 'Possum is a queer fellow. In daytime he hides and sleeps. When the sun has fallen and the dense forests are still, he likes best to travel. Anywhere, almost everywhere, he will go in search of food. Into the apple orchard he may wander provided there are no persimmon trees nearby. He also feeds on locusts and wild grapes and satisfies his appetite on any wild fruit within convenient distance of his resting place.
