

Esch Day Care Bill Vetoed; Reps Split 2-2

Republican Congressman Marvin Esch of Ann Arbor was one of the original co-sponsors of the child development program that was vetoed by President Nixon last Thursday.

The bill would have appropriated $2 billion for fiscal year 1973 to provide comprehensive day-care services to working mothers, but was vetoed because of its "fiscal irresponsibility, administrative unworkability and family-weakening implications of the system it envisions," according to the president.

When it passed the House on Dec. 7, U.S. Reps. Esch and William Ford (D-Taylor) voted for it, while U.S. Reps. William Broomfield (R-Royal Oak) and Jack McDonald (R-Farmington) voted against it. The total House vote was 210 to 186.

IT PASSED the U.S. Senate the previous week in a 63 to 17 vote with Republican Sen. Robert Griffin and Democratic Sen. Philip Hart voting for it.

Conservative Republicans were generally opposed to the bill but it drew support from women's organizations, civil rights groups, labor and church groups.

Arguments for and against the bill hit at the heart of the family organization and child rearing.

Opponents said it would erode parental authority and the institution of the family, but proponents countered that they would see to it that children of working mothers are well-cared for.

Esch said the bill would provide for extensive child development programs "meaning a wide variety of services to children, such as all-day care for preschoolers — nutrition, medical, dental and psychological services."

"Emerging from the conference was a bill that authorized $2 billion for fiscal 1973 for child development, including $500 million for continuation of Head Start," he said. "The conference report would provide free child development services for families of four with income up to $4,320.

"Families with incomes between $4,320 and $5,916 would pay 10 per cent of income above $4,320, while families with incomes between $5,916 and $8,960 would pay 15 per cent of their income over $5,916."

A SPOKESMAN for McDonald said that McDonald opposed the bill because it failed to specify that the children involved in the program were those of working mothers.

"As far as we could read into the bill, it did not specify that the woman be involved in job training or working. She could just drop the children off and go home and back to bed," the aide said.
