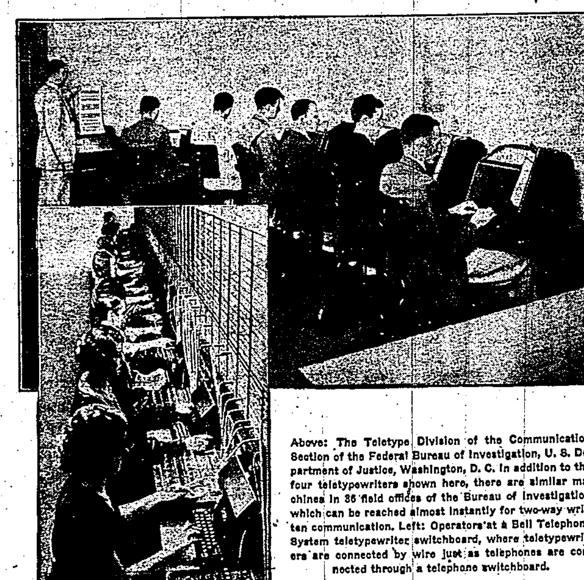
"G-Men" Now Speed Messages Over Nation-wide Teletypewriter Hook-up



Above: The Teletype Division of the Communication Section of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, U. S. Department of Justice, Washington, D. C. In addition to the four teletypewriters shown here, there are similar machines in 36 field offices of the Bureau of Investigation which can be reached almost instantly for two-way written communication. Left: Operators at a Bell Telephone System teletypewriter switchboard, where teletypewriters are connected by wire just as telephones are connected through a telephone switchboard.

Always on the alert to adopt the latest developments of science in its never-ending war on crime, the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the U. S. Department of Justice has recently had teletypewriter exchange service installed for communication between headquarters in Washington and its 36 field offices located in other strategic cities throughout the country.

Operating out of these field offices under the supervision of the Bureau's director, J. Edgar Hoover, and his staff in Washington, are some 500 trained men—the famous "G-Men." Each field office is supervised by a special agent, and is never closed.

Typewriting at a Distance

Teletypewriter exchange service does for the written message what the telephone does for the spoken word. The teletypewriter is not unlike an ordinary typewriter in appearance. But as words are typed out on it, they are also typed out identically and at the same instant on any other teletypewriter with which it is connected by wire. Thus the message is reproduced at the distant point exactly as it is written on the machine which sends it.

Teletypewriter switchboards, operated by the Bell Telephone System, connect one teletypewriter with another, just as its telephone switchboards connect two telephones for an ordinary telephone call. Also, just as several telephones may now be connected for what is known as a telephone conference call, a number of teletypewriters may be connected on one circuit so that all receive the same message at one time.

Operators Connect Machines

Teletypewriter exchange service is generally referred to as TWX. The following may be cited as an example of how it is used by the Bureau of Investigation.

In the communications section of the Bureau, in Washington, one of the men assigned to teletypewriter work throws a switch on one of the four machines in the teletypewriter division, thus connecting it with the TWX switchboard in the telephone company's central office. The TWX operator there types "Opr." which is typed automatically on the Bureau's machine and indicates that she is ready to take the call.

The Bureau's operator types "Denver 52," for instance, and the connection is set up through the switchboards to Denver. A moment later, a bell rings in the Bureau's field office in Denver and the field operator there throws a switch on his teletypewriter and types an acknowledgement. The connection is now established, and the teletypewriter in the Denver office is ready to receive the message typed in Washington.

Several Connected at Once

Again, Washington may want to communicate with all field offices at one time. The Bureau's operator types out "Conference Connection No —," giving a pre-arranged designation. With amazing swiftness, at focal switching points scattered from coast to coast, Bell System operators are galvanized into action. According to a carefully formulated plan, they set about the job of getting all of the Bureau's field offices on the line simultaneously—a conference TWX circuit linking the headquarters of the Bureau with all of its field offices. In well under half an hour, the message is reaching every one of them—being typed off simultaneously, letter by letter, word by word, line by line.

Find Many Uses

Throughout the network of the Bureau, with its headquarters and field offices throughout the country, similar scenes occur at various times during every twenty-four hours. The message may relate to administrative routine, to a robbery, to a kidnaping, to any one of hundreds of crimes which the G-Men track down and—to their credit be it said—so often solve.

The Bureau is using the newly installed TWX network with great effectiveness in its law enforcement activities, which include the investigation of offenses against Federal law. In co-ordinating the work of the new widely separated branches of the Bureau, rapid communication naturally plays an important part. Reports of cases, activities, and movements of personnel, as well as requests for instructions and advice as to methods, are all handled by the fastest communication means between field offices and headquarters and between the various field offices themselves.

Supply Privacy and Speed

An essential requirement of a communication system which meets the needs of the Bureau of Investigation is privacy. Speed, accuracy, and availability for two-way discussions are other essentials. These requirements are, of course, met by long distance telephone service, and for many years the Bureau has been an extensive user of this type of communication. In many cases, however, it is desirable that the message be transmitted in written form, either for the purpose of preserving a permanent record or for other reasons arising out of the nature of the case. TWX service fully and efficiently meets this latter need, in combination with the other requirements above outlined.

Installed in 36 Cities

TWX equipment has been installed in thirty-six of the Bureau's field offices, there being, of course, no installation in the Washington field office, which is located in the headquarters building. The field offices equipped for TWX service include: Aberdeen, S. D.; Atlanta, Ga.; Birmingham, Ala.; Boston, Mass.; Buffalo, N. Y.; Butte, Mont.; Charlotte, N. C.; Chicago, Ill.; Cincinnati and Cleveland, Ohio; Dallas, Tex.; Denver, Colo.; Detroit, Mich.; El Paso, Tex.; Indianapolis, Ind.; Jacksonville, Fla.; Kansas City, Mo.; Little Rock, Ark.; Los Angeles, Calif.; Louisville, Ky.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Nashville, Tenn.; New Orleans, La.; New York, N. Y.; Oklahoma City, Okla.; Omaha, Neb.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Phoenix, Ariz.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Portland, Ore.; Salt Lake City, Utah; San Antonio, Tex.; San Francisco, Calif.; St. Louis, Mo.; St. Paul, Minn.; and Trenton, N. J.

There are four machines in the headquarters offices at Washington and two machines each in the field offices at New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia. All other field offices have one machine each.

STATE PREPARES SNOW REMOVING EQUIPMENT

With early flurries of snow reported in all sections of the state last week, the maintenance division of the state highway department has advanced preparations for the winter's snow removal operations to the point where today the division reported to Commissioner Murray D. Van Wagoner it was ready for any extreme weather.

Snow removal on Michigan's highways has become one of the most important functions of the state highway department. Not satisfied with merely passable roads, the traveling public insists on roads being open in all weather to wheel traffic. In answering this demand the degree of snow removal work has increased to a point where it becomes quite costly.

Last winter snow removal cost averaged $67 per mile for the 8,498 miles of roads kept open. The cost is considered low in view of the heavy snowfall.

In every maintenance garage, trucks, plows, sanders and other items of equipment used in snow removal work have been gone over carefully, repaired and necessary changes made in the hitch connections.

Another phase of the preparation is the removal of obstructions along the roadsides, so that the plows may have plenty of room for their operations.

A gradual change has been noted in the character of snow removal equipment, and in the method employed. Heavy tractor equipment gives way to fast moving trucks. Rotary and "Snogo" plows are now used only when drifts become so high that truck plows cannot throw snow off the road. Not only can snow be removed faster with the lighter equipment, but the latter is much more economical.

Snow removal in the southern part of the lower peninsula has been found to be more expensive than elsewhere in the state. More cities are included in this area, and in cities the snow must be loaded on trucks and removed to outlying districts. Heavier traffic also causes more ice formations, requiring heavy sanding.

Chevrolet's new perfected hydraulic brakes have but one point of adjustment for each brake shoe. As the brake lining gradually wears down, full braking effect is maintained by turning a notched adjusting wheel, inside the drum, reached through a small opening in the flange or in the flange of the drum.

Clutch Springs "Shot-Blasted"

Chevrolet's clutch-disk cushion springs are put through a "shot-blasting process in which they are bombarded with thousands of small lead pellets, which peen the surface evenly and cold work the material, greatly increasing the fatigue strength and endurance capacity of the springs.
