Nit: "What do you mean telling the Boatswain Mate that I'm a fool?"

Witt: "Take it easy. How did I know it was a secret?"

Kind Old Man: "Do you know what happens to little boys who smoke?"

Little Boy: "Sure I do. Every time that they go anywhere to have a nice quiet smoke, they get bothered by rude old men."

Electricity and Steel Making

"Electricity, in the commercial production of steel by use of the electric furnace, is used almost wholly as a source of heat rather than for any direct chemical action, and the steel which results is as a rule purer (of higher quality) than that usually obtained through other processes. Of all factors in the progress of shaping steel into usable cross sections, the invention of the rolling mill by Henry Cort some time in the eighteenth century was the most important. Cort's idea was that steel could be squeezed into shapes between rollers while it was still hot and from his idea grew the present-day rolling mill industry, which in the United States produces about 24 tons of finished product for every ton of castings that is made.—Chicago Tribune.

The sailor sat in the parlor with his girl friend, and grew sentimental. "Dearest," he exclaimed at last, "you have led me to adore—"

"Good!" shouted her father's voice from upstairs. "Now open it and get going."

A Primrose Path

By GEORGE GULLOCK, JR.
© McClure Newspaper Syndicate.
WFO Service.

"VERY neat ankles," thought Hans Bruun as he glanced at the young lady preceding him up the stairs. Then abruptly one of the neat ankles twisted and Fate in a flower landed at his feet.

"Oh, dear, my poor Primula Vulgaris," said the girl a little tearfully.

Hans stooped to take the dirt and fast footed onto his evening paper, "Primula Vulgaris! Say, if you bought this for a Primula Vulgaris, you were yipped. It's a primrose. My mother raised lots of 'em. The girl seemed amazed. 'You mean—but the florist told me it was a Primula Vulgaris. Surely he should know—'

"Maybe he does," Hans admitted—'and maybe he doesn't. I'd swear it's a primrose. However, it might be a good idea to let the argument go till later and get this into something before the roots die of exposure.'"

A smile starting somewhere back in her eyes came softly down to her lips. "Silly," she said, and looked so sweet that Hans knew he was going to like her even better than his mother's apple strudel.

They walked to her door. She hesitated, but finally threw it open. Hans stopped—looked. "To think you, Hans Bruun, have lived five doors from Heaven for months and never guessed, never realized—Miss Jones, on behalf of the Amalgamated Brotherhood of Haters, I wish to congratulate you on your ability to brighten your corner."

The twisted ankle was swelling, Hans noticed. She'd better do something for it right away. He turned to go. "Let me know how the primrose—and your ankle make out," he ventured, and closed the door.

In his room Hans warmed a can of beans and a strip of salt pork over the gas. And ate ambrosia. Lit his pipe and dreamed of a smiling eyed girl who loved flowers and fussed with curtains all day.

Hans liked curtains and flowers, too. Four years in big city printing plants had him yearning for little letter found their way into country newspaper offices. Always the same answer: no help wanted.

A timid knock woke him from reverie. It was Miss Jones.

"Your evening paper," she said. "It was an admirable stretcher. Thank you so much." She started away, hesitated, then: "My ankle's a lot better now, Mr. Bruun," and was off down the hall.

"Hey, wait—" Hans dashed over the door sill, tangled his feet, and felt the floor collide with his face. When his vision cleared, he saw Miss Jones fleeing a handkerchief at his nose and looking alarmed. "Ah-h-h-h," he moaned, and found his head in Miss Jones' lap. "I wanted to know," said he entranced by her eyes, "if you could leave that convalescing primrose long enough to go to the movies with me. I'm lonesome."

"Primula Vulgaris, not primrose," she disagreed.

The Primula Vulgaris, or primrose, thrived. So did Hans. He couldn't have told you why—men are like that. Miss Jones learned to make apple strudel.

And just when cupid began to oil up his bowstring, Hans got a letter from home. Mr. Nabu, publisher, wanted Hans to return to his newspaper. Stairs are no hindrance when you get such news. Hans went up them like a runaway car on a roller coaster.

"Guess what, Helen—Miss Jones!" he roared, bursting into "Heaven."

"I've got it!"

Miss Jones let a perfectly rinsed stocking snap back into the sofa. "Got what? A fix?"

"Nope. A job. A good job. I'm gonna help run a lick newspaper! Back home where I can take a deep breath. What a break! What a job! What a life. Whoopie!"

"You mean—you'll leave the city?" Somehow she didn't feel like dancing around in circles but Hans was running the show.

"Leave it and be glad of the chance," Hans rejoiced. "In two more days Hans Bruun will be back in sunny southern Jersey. Home, Sweet Home!"

Hans didn't sleep very well. He blatted it on his excited happiness. But you and I know that wasn't the reason. That wouldn't account for the empty feeling near his heart. He couldn't understand himself, so he sought explanation five doors down the hall.

"I got to wondering how the primrose is getting along," he said lamely.

"Primula Vulgaris" she corrected, a little savagely.

"Not so good, eh? Needs more sunshine, I guess. You know I'm gonna miss that darn flower when I go. I'll miss these curtains, too, and—Helen—" he whirled, grasped her and hugged her to him like a dreaming man—"It's you I'd really miss," he said, through her hair, "but not now. You're gonna marry me. Say you will, darling, say—"

"Oh, yes Hans . . . yes."

"Till a you have the sticks with me. We'll start another little 'Heaven' together, with these curtains, that primrose—"

"Primula Vulgaris!" she cried to say, but his lips covered her mouth.

Found guilty of refusing to work on a relief job assigned to him, Harlan Bennett of Delaware, O., was sentenced to spend 30 days in jail.

The California Pacific International Exposition at San Diego closed at midnight Armistice Day with a bugler from the United States Navy sounding taps.

The New I. E. S. Better Sight LAMPS

This scientifically designed lamp is not only attractive but protects eyesight. It has an opal glass bowl under the shade, which diffuses the light and assures illumination that is soft and glareless. Part of the light goes to the ceiling (the shade is open at the top) and is reflected back, providing indirect illumination for the rest of the room. Where an ordinary lamp supplies the equivalent of 3 to 10 lighted candles on the printed page, this new lamp furnishes 25 to 50.
