NEWSPAPER SYMBOLISM

(Exchange)
Are you interested in symbolism? Set in the terrazzo tiles of the main lobby of the St. Louis Star-Times building is a series of twelve symbols which tell the story of what a newspaper is, its aims, and what its service means to a community. They are: A scroll to a man in an inkwell which stands beside a scroll. An open book lighted by a candle. A lit torch. A printing press. A winged foot. A twinkling star. A winged column together supporting an editor. A shield. An hour glass. Crossed swords. The American Eagle holding an American flag in its talons. The scales of justice.

The story is thus briefly told: "A newspaper is fundamentally a thing of writing. Hence the scroll and scroll. However, before anything is put on paper, the writer must acquire knowledge of the subjects which his work concerns. The book and candle are symbolic of this knowledge. "The foundation of all real knowledge must be truth, represented by the flaming torch. Of knowledge lighted by truth, is made the physical newspaper, represented by the printing press. "Modern methods and machinery have made possible the dissemination of this information with speed and accuracy. The winged foot of Mercury, and the public is thus enlightened as to current events. The star shining in darkness stands for enlightenment.

"The arm and column symbolize the strength of an enlightened public opinion thus created, and by such opinion the newspaper will come a shield protecting the public weal. This is the meaning of the arm and column. "Throughout the course of time, symbolized by the hour glass, that newspaper carried on a fight for the principle of right. The crossed swords are illustrative of this crusade. Always dominated by principles of true Americanism, depicted by the eagle and the flag, the newspapers strive to have justice done. The scales of justice are the scales."—Herman Ross in the Northfield (Minn.) News.

CRITICISM—SPUR TO ENDEAVOR

(Christian Science Monitor)
The British people more frequently criticize than praise their famous institutions. The Royal Academy, and Oxford and Cambridge are perhaps the chief recipients of this form of encouragement, but lately it has been the turn of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, which recently concluded a most successful session at Norwich. The objects of this organization are threefold: to form a meeting ground for natural scientists, to acquaint new discoveries, and to secure general opinion abreast of the social significance of these discoveries. This year, as in the past, it has excellently fulfilled the first two functions. Research workers from all parts of the country flocked to Norwich, and advances in knowledge were recorded in many subjects.

But in regard to the third aspect of the association's duties, the voice of criticism has been vigorously raised. The association, it is felt, is not in practice the efficient liaison officer between the public and the trend of thought in natural science which, it is felt, should be at Leicester two years ago. The association has replied convincingly that its activities are not purely academic or theoretic. It is indeed a force in national life. It took up the question of water advantage with the government, and instituted schemes for dealing with it. It speeded up the badly-needed reform of the Ordnance Survey maps, and it has acted vigorously in drawing attention to the need for national parks.

Yet there is perhaps something in the criticism, after all. Fundamentally, it is based on one of the chief problems of education in a modern world. There was never a time when the general level of knowledge was so high, and yet it is probably true that there has never been so wide a gap between the specialist knowledge of experts and that of the general public. Especially is this so in natural science and in history, and any organization which could efficiently make available for ordinarily well-informed citizens the advances registered in these two departments of learning would perform a much-needed service.

RECKLESS STOPPING

(Exchange)
Enumerated are the ways in which an automobile accident can happen. The least deviation from sane and careful driving may bring fatal results. One dangerous hazard on the highways is to be constantly guarded against, is the driver who has a habit of bringing his car to an abrupt stop regardless of traffic conditions. This individual is discussed by an automobile association as follows: "Reckless driving is usually associated with speed and other dangerous practices. It must be recognized though that the reckless stopper is also far from "wild." The driver who brings his car to a sudden and signalless stop accounts for a large number of serious accidents. How many times have you been forced to use your brakes and scratch your wheel to avoid a car brought to a quick halt directly in front of you without indication of any kind?"
 Don't DAY-DREAM while driving.

MAKE IT SAFE AND SANE

(Exchange)
The small game season for hunters in Michigan has opened. From now on seasons will open and close until late in the year. The annual conflict between the farmers and the lawless is now on. Among the thousands of men (and women) who love to hunt, the lawless element is in the minority—but he casts a stigma on the sport in general. All lovers of the great outdoors should join with the farmers in running him down. As every hunter in Michigan goes forth into the woods and the fields in search of game he should keep well in his mind the warning: Be Careful!

Each fall hunting hazards become a very serious matter in Michigan, especially during the upland bird-hunting season in the lower peninsula. Tens of thousands of hunters will trek into the woods during the next few days with their guns. One small act of recklessness may result in the death or serious injury of one or more persons.

During the brief period while pheasant-hunting was legal last season, the reckless and careless handling of shotguns took the lives of a dozen sportsmen and injured others, some of them seriously. The accident record for the 1931-1935 small game season was 30 dead and 100 injured.
 A firm decision to abide by the rules of caution and safety may save a life.

Gun Club Members Uphold Game Laws

Hunting for game and fish law violators is one of the principal activities of the Crayon Rod and Gun Club of Crystal, Montclair County.
 When this organization hears that an individual is violating the conservation laws, it sends a committee to visit the man.
 In a friendly way the committee informs the individual of the cause of its visit and then urges him to quit violating, join the club and cooperate actively in promoting local conservation activities and better law observance.
 According to E. S. Hammond, president, the club is pointing along that road as follows: "Hunters Beware. Our members have agreed to report or prosecute all violators of the state game law. Crayon Rod and Gun Club."
