There was no one on guard at the eastern entrance, so nobody noticed that the sand was pling up little by little in front of the heavy log gate which had carlessly been left open. Maj. Daniel Beasley, commander of the fort, standing at the door of his quarters at noonday, may have noticed it. But if he did, it didn't seem important. A moment later he saw another sight which chilled his blood. Speeding across the sandy field outside he for the fort, standing at the forther mass of facts. Creek variors, at least a thousand of them! Shouting "Indians! Indians!" at the top of his lungs, Major Beasley dashed toward the gate. As the howing savages swarmed down open him, he thrust his shoulder against the rough timbers and pushed. It started to swing shut, then stopped. The diffetd sand was holding it back. The major bent his back and pushed. It started to swing shut, then stopped. The diffetd sand was holding it back. The major bent his back and pushed. It was too late. A Creek warrior tom.
