Shared Driving Means Better Trip

Many men never let their wives drive while on vacation trips—not because of gallantry, but because they're afraid they'll end up in a crash.

But husbands and wives should take turns driving, says Don Costa, safety director of the Allstate Insurance Companies.

"The husband and wife who drive as a team are less likely to become involved in a serious crash this summer," Costa says.

"Sharing the driving load decreases the possibility of a traffic crash caused by fatigue or 'road hypnosis.' Besides, it adds a lot to the vacation to be able to enjoy the scenery."

Male unwillingness to let the women drive may be linked with the age-old myth (propagated by men, of course) that "women are terrible drivers." Costa suggests that men build confidence in their wives' driving ability by giving them practical road experience.

HE ALSO advises these sound driving practices for trips.

- Change drivers, or at least make a rest stop, every two hours.
- Let the passenger function as co-pilot — which means reading signs and maps, and watching out for safety hazards.
- At night, when visibility is reduced, be sure the passenger stays awake to help keep the driver alert and watch for signs of driver fatigue.
