

LOSEY CORNERS

Mr. and Mrs. D. V. Mitchell left for the World's Fair in New York Friday. They will be gone a week. The work of moving the two school buildings was started Tuesday. They will join the new building and will be completely renovated before being used this fall for classes. The old building will remain on the grounds where it was built over 100 years ago, until sold at public auction.

Services for Hope Chapel Sunday School and church as well as other meetings will be held in the new brick school until the church which is under construction is in a useable condition.

Mr. and Mrs. Palmerier are happy over the arrival of a baby boy born Sunday morning, July 2. Mrs. McLeod has returned home from a trip to Montreal, Canada, where she spent the past week visiting friends and relatives. The Posters have completed a fine new produce stand on their property at the corner of Six Mile and Middle Belt.

There will be no Sunday evening services at Hope Chapel until further notice.

Following Sunday service many of the parents and friends of the Boy Scouts joined them at Commerce Lake for a potluck dinner and swimming in the afternoon. A rumor leaked out that cook Roy Nichols tried water and claimed they were flapjacks.

The W. M. A. held a potluck picnic at the home of Mrs. William Horie, Wednesday at 12:30.

The Sunday School picnic will be held Saturday, July 15, at Lola Valley park, potluck at noon with games for the afternoon. There will be transportation for all who gather at the church grounds at 10:30 a. m.

AT THE REDFORD THEATER

"Confessions of a Nazi Spy," the sensational Warner Bros. picture coming to the Redford Theater, represents a complete reversal of Hollywood precedent in more ways than one.

In the first place, the motion picture producers in the past have avoided controversial subjects like the plague. But Warner could hardly have chosen a subject packed with more potential dynamite than the spy picture.

Then, contrary to all precedent, they literally filmed the picture behind locked doors. No one not directly concerned with the production was allowed on the set. This rule was rigidly adhered to with no exceptions made for executives of the company or members of the press.

Ordinarily, studios are anxious to announce the casts of their pictures. That's showmanship and good advertising, for every name added to the box office. After the first ten principals had been chosen for "Confessions of a Nazi Spy," however, Warner's clamped down on all casting news and announced that the rest of the players would be known by number instead of name.

Priests as Firemen
In 1705, King Louis XIV of France founded the Paris fire brigade. Forty firemen formed the first brigade, and they were recruited from workmen used to doing their jobs high above the ground. A number of years later, an auxiliary fire brigade was formed for the guarding of Paris. This was composed of four companies of priests. The great bell of the cathedral of Notre Dame was used as a fire warning. On one occasion, when there was a big fire at the famous hospital of the Hotel Dieu (which adjoins Notre Dame), 20 of these firemen-priests were burned to death in trying to rescue the patients.

The Prize

By WILLIAM SNYDER
(Released by Associated Newspapers
WNU Service.)

FULL of his news, Martin Stevens let himself in with his latchkey and hurried across the hall to the living-room without taking time to remove his overcoat. His wife was sewing by the west window, her eyes straining over the material in the last of the daylight.

"Is that you, Martin?" she murmured without looking up.

"It did get it right, Alice," he almost shouted, startling her so that she dropped the needle she was threading.

"Get what?" irritably, as she searched for the needle. "Close the door into the hall, Martin; it lets in a draft. What did you say you got?" her tone more amiable as she located the needle.

A little dashed, her husband closed the door and took off his overcoat before he answered, but he could not keep a note of exultation out of his voice then.

"That puzzle thing I was trying to work the other night, when all of you made fun of me and said I couldn't do it. I sent it in just for fun and I won a prize."

The staid man of business was as pleased as a child who has received a good school report. And Mrs. Stevens was excited now.

"Isn't that splendid? I can order the new curtains for the rug for the dining-room. I'll call up right away—Arnold's won't be closed yet."

"But—" he began futilely, for she had gone.

He took a step or two after her, then shrugged his shoulder. Oh, well, he had been meaning to tell her that she could get the curtains and rug anyway.

He was settling into a chair by the fire when the door flew open and Suzette bounced in, charming in her bright green frock and little black hat.

"Oh, papa," she shrieked (shrieking was her "line" just now), "mamma says you got the prize for that funny contest. Now I can have a permanent at Anton's and a new evening coat, can't I?"

It was a statement, not a question. "Give me a check now, and I'll get the coat and an appointment with Anton in the morning. A hundred and fifty will do both of them. Who would have thought I had such a smart dad?"

"But, Suzette, I can't—I didn't—" Her soft red lips had begun to quiver, her blue eyes to fill.

"Why, papa, you're going to divide with us, aren't you? If mamma can have the curtains and things she wants, surely you'll let your little girl have a little old permanent and a coat for dances. My old one looks just horrid with the new long dress."

Then she brightened, for her father was taking out his checkbook resignedly. She hung over him, chattering fondly, until the magic slip was signed, then she danced out, waving it in the air to dry the ink.

The front door slammed, and Suzette shrieked at the new arrival, zette shrieked at the new arrival, zette shrieked at the new arrival.

"When Wilfred dashed in Martin Stevens' fountain pen was already poised over the checkbook.

"What is your pet desire of the moment, son?" he queried with a grin that went unnoticed.

"Gee, dad, you're a lucky one, aren't you? If you could let me have fifty, I'd go on that week-end trip with the fellows. Thanks a lot, dad—see you at dinner."

A moment later a light step in the hall presaged the entrance of Aunt Lucy, her delicate face beaming.

"Well, Martin, Alice just told me of your good fortune. I am so glad that you can give me something now to help with the settlement girls. Twenty-five would be about right. I thank you in behalf of the settlement."

"Hello, Martin, you lucky dog!" boomed a hearty voice. "Hi, I—brought you out. Yeah, your Suzette told my Elsie about it. Now, old man, you'd have to come across with that subscription to the new club-house. I'm going to put you down for five hundred. Easy—come—easy go—ha, ha! See you tomorrow."

Martin sank limply into his chair before the fire, and drawing a neat slip of blue paper from his wallet contemplated it ruefully. It read: "Pay to the order of Mrs. Martin Stevens $5 dollars as tenth prize in the Whattis puzzle contest."

Garden of Eden Improved
With life-giving water from recently completed irrigation projects, the government of Iraq is transforming the traditional story of the Garden of Eden from dusty desert into green, productive land. West of Baghdad, between the ancient Euphrates and Tigris rivers, the reported home of the Biblical Eden is fast learning the ways of modern civilization. Over it fly birdmen of three airlines. By it roll the mechanized giants of rail and motor bus transport. Little more than a hundred miles away are the two pipe lines through which oil flows hundreds of miles to Mediterranean ports.
