SHOW THAT NYA HELPS KEEP BOYS OUT OF PRISON

American youth between the ages of 16 and 25, working part-time on the three major subdivisions of the National Youth Administration program—school aid, college aid, and out-of-school projects—receive an average wage of $125 annually from the Federal government. Youth of the same age in Federal prisons represent a yearly expense of $2,750 for housing alone. Food, clothing, and other maintenance costs raise this figure considerably.

These facts were brought out in a recent address before the House of Representatives by the Honorable Louis C. Rabaut. Pointing out that by their retention in the NYA program, youth were held from an overloaded field of unemployment, he urged that the program be given "every consideration."

Quoting J. Edgar Hoover as stating that the majority of arrests are youth 16 to 24 years of age, he maintained that securing work for idle hands is a paramount corrective measure for keeping young people from the evils of crime.

Last year the NYA gave part-time employment to 265,000 high school students, 125,000 college students, and 235,000 unemployed out-of-school youth. The cost of maintaining these projects is considerably less than that of keeping the 1,100 additional prisoners in Federal penitentiaries over the staggering total of a year ago.

The Michigan NYA employs an average of 22,000 young people annually in all phases of the program. These youth are materially aided in continuing their education and in increasing the level of their employability.
